Mr. Colvin: My hon. Friend will know that the measures contained in the Act—particularly more flexible hours—are welcomed by the licensed trade. It also welcomes the more stringent regulations that will permit action to be taken against under-age drinkers, but how are licensees to know when a drinker is under age? At present, a publican serving an under-age drinker risks losing not only his licence but his livelihood and his home. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has recently been issued with an identity card by his local pub to prove that he is over the age of 18, why will the Home Office not support the move to a national identity card scheme?

Mr. Hogg: That is a very much wider question, to which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will, I believe, be making a response later. We are much in favour of the voluntary schemes that are now in place. The new Act, and particularly the amendment of section 169, will make some licensees a little more cautious than they have been hitherto. I make the point that only a minority of licensees have been acting improperly.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: As under-age drinking seems to have reached epidemic proportions in many parts of the country, and as the situation will probably grow worse with the introduction of all-day drinking, when will the Minister take action on the Masham committee report, and when will he announce the Wakeham committee's recommendations on under-age drinking? Do not the events of this summer prove the folly of legislating to relax licensing laws before anything is done about drink-related problems?

Mr. Hogg: As usual, the hon. Lady is mistaken. She either exaggerates or gets her conclusions wrong. The Licensing Act 1988 incorporates many of the recommendations of Lady Masham's report, and the Wakeham committee, chaired by my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council, has announced its conclusions frequently.

Mrs. Taylor: What are the Government doing?

Mr. Hogg: I hear the hon. Lady chattering from the Front Bench. One of the things that we are doing is drawing to the attention of the police and the courts all the procedures and provisions that exist in statute, and they are extremely comprehensive.

Uniformed Police (Sussex)

4. Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he anticipates there will be an increase in the number of uniformed police on the beat in Sussex.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will consider the application from Sussex police authority for more police officers, along with similar applications from other police authorities, before making the next allocation of additional police posts under the programme which he announced in May 1986. We cannot at this stage give an exact date for the decision.

Mr. Higgins: My hon. Friend will recall that in March 1987 he issued a press statement saying that 66 additional police were to be provided in Sussex to enhance operational police strength, mainly in terms of increasing patrol cover and community policing. That statement was completely untrue. There has been no increase in the number of police on the beat in Sussex. When will my hon. Friend put the matter right?

Mr. Hogg: I understand my right hon. Friend's concern, and he has always put his case with much vigour, but I have to say that I do not agree with his conclusions. Since May 1979, for example, the police establishment in Sussex has increased by 121, and the number of civilians employed by 154. Even allowing for the fact that 109 of the police officers have been allocated to Gatwick duty, there has none-the-less been a significant increase in the number of police officers available for operational duty.

My right hon. Friend will be aware—and I think that he will welcome it—that at Worthing there has been a change in the operation of the uniformed and crime process units, which I am glad to say has significantly increased the amount of time available for patrol duties by all officers in these units.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Was the most recent request for extra police for Sussex met in full? Perhaps the Minister might extend it to Kent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about Sussex.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If it was not—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should confine the question to Sussex.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If it was not met in full for Sussex, why was it also not met in full for Cumbria? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is an absolute abuse of our procedure to try to ask a question on a completely different topic.

Police Cells (Prisoners)

5. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the change in the number of prisoners held in police cells since his statement of 30 March, Official Report, column 1083.

Mr. Hurd: The number of prisoners held in police cells has fallen from 1,374 on 30 March to 690 yesterday. I make that a reduction of 684.

Mr. Baldry: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Monday's Green Paper "Punishment, Custody and the Community" will help to reduce our prison population by providing more tough but non-custodial sentences?

Mr. Hurd: I hope so, but that will be up to the magistrates and judges who pass sentence. If these ideas bear fruit, they will have a wider range of disposals, including tough punishing disposals, outside prison.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the Home Secretary aware that many of the people held in police cells are youngsters of 18 and under, who are held there because there are not places in many of the prisons? Some of them are held in prisons such as Armley in Leeds. The Minister told me in a written answer last Friday that two youngsters aged 18 and 17 had committed suicide there. I have been informed by the probation service that there have been three suicides during a period of a few weeks. Will the Home Secretary set up an investigation and let us know what is going on in Leeds?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is ranging wide, but it is true that police cells are not the right places for prisoners, whatever their age, and that is why we are working, with increasing success, to reduce numbers. They have already been halved and I expect, without making any rash promises, that we shall make further progress as new prisons open—we have two new prisons opening in the latter part of this year—and as Ashford remand centre is reopened. As we develop the prison building programme and it comes into effect that will also relieve overcrowding in places such as Armley.

Mr. Wheeler: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, with over 69,000 persons received into prison last year, his Green Paper has been received exceptionally well as one of the most thoughtful and far-reaching contributions for many decades on the complicated problem of keeping non-violent offenders out of prison and finding alternatives for those persons who might otherwise be remanded in custody? Will not ideas such as tracking, curfew orders and even experiments with electronic monitoring do much to contain the prison population and reduce the problem created by the number of people on remand?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, with his experience of these matters, for that commendation. I hope that the Green Paper will be studied by right hon. and hon. Members and, more important, by those whose responsibility it is to judge, case by case, how they should sentence those who have been convicted.

Mr. Cox: Is the Home Secretary aware that the continuation of this policy is an utter disgrace, that people who are held in police cells on remand are denied the rights that people held in prison have, and that magistrates, police consultative committees and the police themselves condemn that policy? When will the Home Secretary stop it?

Mr. Hurd: The policy is to reduce and eventually do away with the use of police cells for prisoners. We have halved the number of people so held since the beginning of March, so we are half way to achieving that. Part of that policy consists of the prison building programme, which Opposition Members have consistently opposed and criticised. That has brought 6,000 prison places into being since June 1983 and aims to produce 22,000 new places in all by the mid-1990s.

Identity Cards

6. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of calls for membership cards for football supporters, he will re-examine the introduction of national identity cards to aid the fight against disorderly and lawless behaviour.

Mr. Hurd: Membership cards for football supporters is a separate question from the issue of compulsory identity cards for everyone. We remain to be persuaded that there is a sufficiently strong case for the introduction of universal compulsory identity cards.

Mr. Bruce: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply, but I am somewhat disappointed, since we have read in our newspapers that such a study is going on. Surely my right hon. Friend must agree that as we already must have various identity cards the principle has been accepted in many situations. Certainly the police in Dorset would be happy to see national identity cards as an additional aid to fighting crime. Such cards would help those football clubs that are introducing membership cards to do so correctly. They would also help a great deal in registering everybody for the community charge and in all sorts of ways, such as fighting benefit and other kinds of fraud.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend raises a number of points. A national identity card system would not be much use to football clubs. They are being asked to produce a selective scheme, whereas the national identity card would be universal. That means that they will want to keep out of their scheme people who would, under my hon. Friend's idea, have a national identity card. That illustrates the point. My hon. Friend has been reading the newspapers, as I have also, and what is said about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's supposed activities is simple make-believe. It is true that I have asked the police for an up-to-date and considered assessment. Their established view has been that they do not think that a system of compulsory national identity cards, with associated powers for the police, would help them. They have thought that the disadvantages would outweigh the advantages. In view of the renewed interest in the House and elsewhere in the subject, I have asked them for their considered and updated view.

Mr. Benn: Has the Home Secretary considered the moral issues that are raised by the fact that the Government are contemplating a police computer dossier on every citizen in the country, while the Home Secretary is presenting a White Paper on official secrets that would deny to the electors knowledge about what the Government are doing? The proposed legislation will be of the kind that has concealed from public attention crimes committed by people such as Peter Wright, who describes in detail in his book crimes committed by the security service against the liberties of the subject. How does that fit in with the glorious revolution, which is supposed to have safeguarded our political liberties?

Mr. Hurd: Surely that is the right hon. Gentleman's speech for tomorrow. I do not think that it arises from this question.

Sir Peter Hordern: Will my right hon. Friend consider the issue of identity cards, not only in relation to lawless behaviour, but to enable those who have the right to seek supplementary benefit and social security to do so easily and conveniently when the new computer system comes into use? Is it not time that we thought about the issue of identity cards to do away with the degrading conditions that exist in so many social security offices?

Mr. Hurd: It is perfectly reasonable that that idea should be thought about. I foresee a continued growth of cards such as the one that my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce) showed the House just now, which he carries as a matter of convenience to identify himself for specific purposes. I think that such cards will increase. There is a very substantial difference, however, between those cards, which I believe will increase and which are useful, and a scheme by which everyone in the country would be compelled to have a national indentity card and in which the police had powers to compel people to produce those cards.

Mr. Hattersley: I welcome the Home Secretary's first answer. Like him, I believe that a system of compulsory national identity cards would not make up in its contribution to a reduction in crime what we would lose in civil liberties.

The Home Secretary's second answer concerned the police feasibility study. I urge him to follow his instinct on the matter, which is to use if for his speech at the Tory party conference and then to forget about it.

Mr. Hurd: I believe that the police view is important, but it is not necessarily decisive. The matter is for Parliament to decide, of course. However, I think that it is important to discover whether the established police view, which is the one I described and with which the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) as a former Home Secretary is familiar, is still maintained.

Mr. John Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the greatest protections afforded to the terrorist, the hooligan, the illegal immigrant and even the under-age drinker is anonymity? In an age when credit cards are commonplace, will my right hon. Friend agree to consider the matter in depth? People should be issued with identity cards, although they need not necessarily carry them. They should, however, be available.

Mr. Hurd: I do not really believe that the determined terrorist with whom we have to deal would be especially detected or deterred by a system of national identity cards that did not require him to carry any such document.

Concessionary Television Licences

7. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a further statement concerning his policy towards the provision of concessionary television licences to pensioners.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): No. The matter was fully discussed in the debate in the House on 12 July.

Mr. Livsey: Now that the Government have decided to put up the concessionary television licence from 5p to £5, will the Minister seek to end the discrimination between one group of pensioners living in a small street who pay the full licence fee and others who do not? Surely the time is right for all pensioners to have a concessionary television licence of £5, as has recently been introduced.

Mr. Renton: No, Sir. The purpose of the new regulations that we brought in was to return help under the scheme to those for whom it was originally intended, who were not those living in mainstream housing. If we followed the hon. Gentleman's suggestion it would mean a substantial increase in the licence fee for everyone else —about 50 per cent. if we were to give free licences for all pensioners—and that would greatly damage some people who are not pensioners, and who are much worse off than some pensioners, such as those on income support.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Have we not just heard a classic example of SLD woolly thinking? If free television licences were given to all pensioners, a lot of very affluent people would be getting their television licence at no cost at all, while others on limited incomes and looking after children would have to pay.

Mr. Renton: Before I answer my hon. Friend's question, perhaps he could define the SLD for me. Of course it is woolly thinking, which does not try to concentrate help on those most in need. It is not a thought-out or practical policy in any sense of the word.

Mr. Corbett: We know that the Government and their supporters do not like the concessionary licence scheme in any event, but will the Minister at least reconsider the Peacock committee's suggestion of exempting pensioner households which depend on means-tested benefit as a start and concentrating help in that way? Or is he saying that those of us at work would resent paying the estimated £5 a year extra that it would cost to give such help to the 1½ million pensioners who would qualify?

Mr. Renton: As I told the hon. Gentleman in the debate last week, the point behind the Peacock recommendation is that if anyone should get a concessionary television licence it should not be pensioners specifically, but those on income support. That is the point to which Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen failed to address themselves, and they have returned instead to the simple election bribe of free television licences for all pensioners.

Mr. Kilfedder: Will the Minister look again at this question? Many pensioners to whom I have talked ask for compassion from the Government. Does the Minister accept that many pensioners live on their own, often far from municipal and shopping centres, and that their movements are restricted virtually to the four walls of their dwelling and their garden? The television opens the world to them. Will the Minister therefore grant concessionary television licences to pensioners?

Mr. Renton: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about the importance of television to many pensioners. However, I would point out that last spring when representatives of the National Federation of Retirement Pensioners Associations called on my hon. Friend the Minister of State and my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who was then at the Home Office, they made it absolutely plain that they opposed free television licences for pensioners because most pensioners do not want to seem to be supported by such charity.

Special Constables

8. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall on the use of special constables at weekends to police towns and villages in Cornwall.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Deployment of the special constabulary is an operational matter for individual chief officers. I understand from the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall that in Cornwall special constables are deployed at weekends to assist with such occasions as local carnivals and fetes and to assist with local crime prevention initiatives.

It is common for the special constabulary to police rural towns and villages at weekends in support of regular police officers.

Mr. Taylor: The Minister may like to know that my constituents, particularly in Truro and St. Austell, have reported considerable feelings of intimidation to me. In the light of that, I have on a number of occasions asked for more full-time constables, but the Government will not give the Devon and Cornwall constabulary the numbers that it would like. Will the Minister therefore look into the question to see whether the excellent work done by the special constabulary, whose numbers have risen recently, cannot be used to mitigate some of my constituents' worries, particularly on Friday and Saturday evenings?

Mr. Hogg: I am very much in favour of the special constabulary, which can, indeed, do a valuable job. In terms of the manpower available to the force, the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that since May 1979 the number of police in his county force has risen by 133 and the number of civilians by 160. He will also be pleased to know that the force has a clean-up rate well above the national average and that the number of offences per 100,000 of the population is well below the national average.

Mr. Harris: I welcome the figures just mentioned by my hon. Friend, but is he aware that the 800 or so special constables in the counties of Devon and Cornwall between them now account for 80,000 hours of policing? Does he agree that this is a public-spirited duty, and will he do all he can to encourage people to join this excellent force?

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend has said. I must declare an interest: I was once a member of the special constabulary. [Laughter.] When they are properly trained and doing their stuff, they are extremely useful.

Fire Services (Accident Response Time)

9. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to the fire services to provide a minimum response time by fire tenders for accidents on major trunk roads.

Mr. John Patten: No, Sir. Fire authorities have a discretionary power to use their fire brigade for non-firefighting purposes such as attendances at road accidents. We are not persuaded that it would be appropriate or necessary to prescribe a minimum response time for such work.

Mr. Batiste: Does my hon. Friend agree that serious risk to life is involved if there is unnecessary delay in responding to the serious accidents that often occur on dangerous roads, such as the A1 in my constituency? Will he therefore reconsider his guidance to the fire authorities on the discretionary use of fire appliances in those circumstances?

Mr. Patten: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know of his concern about the number of road accidents and the service given to those involved in them on the A1 in his constituency. This issue was last examined by the relevant joint committee in 1985, as my hon. Friend knows. At that stage, no recommendation such as my hon. Friend would like was made. However, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering setting up a new joint committee to look at the use of fire appliances to see whether such instruction about the hitherto discretionary use should be changed in some way.

Mr. McCartney: Response times to fires on trunk roads are constantly reviewed by fire authorities. The major problem is not mistakes made by fire authorities or unprofessional conduct on their part, but the millions of pounds that have been cut from fire authority budgets, last year and this year. The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) would be well advised to support Opposition Members, who have consistently tried to improve fire authorities' resources so as to improve the times taken to get to accidents and fires and to improve the overall performance of fire authorities in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Patten: That is nonsense. Her Majesty's Inspector of Fire Services constantly monitors the service given by fire services and by all fire authorities in the kingdom.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend will agree that, in spite of the Government's excellent road building programme, because of the increasing congestion on our major roads it is not possible, even with the best will in the world, for our emergency services to get through to the scenes of accidents. Is it not time for a major review to examine the role of helicopters in the emergency services, such as those that are available in West Germany, where helicopters are called in as a matter of course to serious accidents on major roads?

Mr. Patten: That is kept under review as we review the workings of the excellent emergency services in this country. My hon. Friend has put his finger on a fast developing problem.

Risley Remand Centre

10. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the report on Risley remand centre following his answer to the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) on 30 June, Official Report, column 301; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: One hon. Member has asked a question about implementation of suicide prevention measures and questions have been asked in another place about action on the report. I have had two letters from hon. Members, and three from the general public. The required suicide prevention procedures have been carried out since the inspection and measures are being taken, as the hon. Gentleman knows, to ensure an immediate and continuing improvement in conditions at Risley.

Mr. Wigley: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there was a general welcome for the rigorous nature of Judge Tumim's investigation, however disturbing its consequences? Is he further aware that there was a welcome for his positive attitude to it? As the future of Risley, as he sees it, is as a local prison, will he give an undertaking that there will be alternative remand facilities in north Wales, to avoid having to send people from that area to Risley?

Mr. Hurd: I shall look into that point and write to the hon. Gentleman. I am grateful for his general remarks. To use his terms, the report certainly was rigorous and disturbing, and I hope he feels that, as he said, our response to it was timely and vigorous.

Mr. Butler: Does my right hon. Friend believe that grisly Risley is a good advertisement for public sector prisons?

Mr. Hurd: If my hon. Friend waits until next week he will see how I propose that we should experiment with the private management of remand prisons.

Mr. John Evans: Will the Home Secretary take this opportunity to say a word on behalf of the prison officers at Risley, many of whom live in Culcheth where I live and are bitter and resentful about the way in which they have been treated by this report? Will he confirm that the crumbling, overcrowded conditions at Risley have nothing to do with the prison officers, but everything to do with the incompetence of the Home Office?

Mr. Hurd: The problems at Risley are the result of the same phenomenon that afflicts many of our prisons and most of our remand centres, namely overcrowding, which until recently has been unrelieved by a decent prison building programme. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the staff at Risley have been undergoing a serious and testing time. I do not think that they complain about the nature of the report. I know that they have been disturbed by some of the headline publicity surrounding it, but I believe that they support the action that we have taken.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Jack: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Jack: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the National Union of Teachers is wrong yet again when it blames Government policies for violence in schools? Does she agree also that, as discipline starts at home, that may be difficult for some parents to achieve because they were victims of the NUT's approach to teaching in the permissive 1960s?

The Prime Minister: I agree that young children's conduct is usually laid down by the standards that are set at home long before they go to school. It is wrong to attribute violence in schools and elsewhere to any one set of causes. It is a very complex phenomenon, and we wish to see as much kindly discipline in the home as possible and to support those teachers who are trying to give discipline and good teaching in the classroom.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to explain to families in Britain how a large rise in their mortgage payments combats inflation?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman saw the figures published yesterday, he will know that there was a necessity to tighten the money supply. I shall repeat what the Chancellor said in his Budget speech:

"Short-term interest rates remain the essential instrument of monetary policy. Within a continuous and comprehensive assessment of monetary conditions, I will continue to set interest rates at the level necessary to ensure downward pressure on inflation."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 192, c. 997.]

That is what he has done and I support it.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister tell the people of this country, in the plain language that they deserve to hear, how it is that the average mortgage payer, paying an extra £22 a month for the mortgage on his home, is helping to combat inflation?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman understood anything about monetary policy, he would not need even to ask that question. Of course an increase in interest rates, when it comes to a certain limit, puts up mortgage interest rates. Of course that takes other pressure of demand out of the economy. Of course that helps the money supply.

Mr. Kinnock: I recall that in the Budget four months ago, the Government got their inflation forecast, their balance of payments forecast and their money supply forecast hideously wrong. Will the Prime Minister, who once said that steep rises in mortgage rates were the result of Government economic mismanagement, explain how big rises in mortgage payments combat inflation?

The Prime Minister: We do not take lectures on inflation from the Labour party—[Interruption.] For one month the Labour party got inflation down to 7·4 per cent., which was the lowest. Prices rose about as much in a single year during the last Labour Government as they have in the whole of my right hon. Friend's five years as Chancellor.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Without anticipating the contents of the Queen's Speech may I ask my right hon. Friend, whether she agrees that it is vital to introduce legislation in the next Session to ban experiments on the human embryo, a measure for which there would be overwhelming support in the House?

The Prime Minister: I cannot anticipate everything that will be in the Queen's Speech. I know that very strong views are held on that matter on both sides of the opinion divide and that those views are not necessarily across party lines. We shall need a very great deal of debate before we decide precisely what to put into legislation.

Q2. Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cox: The Prime Minister and I are both London Members and we are both aware of the enormous increase in house prices in London. Can she tell first-time buyers in London, who are estimated now to have to find another £40 per month on mortgage repayments, how they are better off under her policies? Is that not yet another example of the callous indifference that she shows towards people trying, with all the difficulties of housing in London, to obtain a home while she puts yet further problems in their path?

The Prime Minister: As I said earlier, it is absolutely vital to keep downward pressure on inflation, because the worst thing for everyone would occur if we had the kind of inflation that was customary under the Labour Government. May I point out to the hon. Gentleman, also as a London Member, that the number of people who own their own houses has greatly increased under this Government and will continue to do so. We shall continue the policy of tax relief on mortgages.

Mr. Burt: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the phrase "cruel and unusual punishment" which appears in the Bill of Rights that we celebrated yesterday. Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that the Home Office might find itself accused of just that should a prisoner unfortunately be locked up in a cell with a member of the Opposition who has wilfully refused to pay his taxes?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has made his point more effectively than I could. He is well aware that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has recently published a White Paper on suitable punishments.

Q3. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Evans: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to explain to the House why, last night, she cast her vote to force handicapped people to pay the full rate of poll tax?

The Prime Minister: For the very good reasons that were given at the time and also because of the enormous increase in benefits that the Government have given to the disabled over the years. We have increased spending on benefits for the long term sick and disabled by more than 80 per cent. over and above inflation, to almost £6·75 billion. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the mentally handicapped are not liable to the community charge. The physically disabled can receive up to 80 per cent. rebates at higher levels of income than other people, and if they are on income support they will receive help with the other 20 per cent.

Q4. Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Peacock: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the practice whereby an elected councillor—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that we can conduct Prime Minister's Question Time in good order today.

Mrs. Peacock: —whereby elected councillors in one borough obtain cushy jobs in a nearby borough at the expense of ratepayers, as Miss Linda Bellos has done, should be outlawed? Will my right hon. Friend take steps to ensure that the recommendations of the Widdicombe report are put into operation as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has taken a specific example of the things of which the Widdicombe report complained and about which it made proposals to deal. A White Paper is due out on the Widdicombe proposals later today. I have reason to think that it will contain something about the point that my hon. Friend raises.

Mr. Beith: Whose view does the Prime Minister support on exchange rate management and joining the EMS—that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or that of her adviser over the water, Professor Walters? Is she satisfied to preside over a divided Government? If not, which one will she back, and which one will she sack?

The Prime Minister: I am very happy to preside over a Government who have such an excellent economic policy, which has produced prosperity at a level undreamed of before in this country. I congratulate the Chancellor on his excellent policies.

Q5. Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Prime Ministerif she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Miss Nicholson: In her busy day, has my hon. Friend had time to congratulate the Secretary of State for the Environment on the successful passage of the Local Government Finance Bill—an infinitely fairer, more just and superior system than any combination of local income tax and fresh property tax?

The Prime Minister: Yes, the new community charge is far fairer than the existing rating system. It is far fairer than any system based on domestic rating revaluation, which would have been extremeley unfair. It is infinitely fairer than any of the Opposition's proposals for an income tax and capital values, which would hit old people very much and mean that everyone would have to reveal his income to their local authority.

Mr. Terry Davis: Does the Prime Minister appreciate that people's views of the effects of the Local Government Finance Bill will be influenced by their experience of recent legislation, such as the changes in social security? What has the Prime Minister to say to my constituents, such as an unemployed man who this week was told by the social fund officers at Erdington in Birmingham that he must live in an unfurnished flat and that he could not have a crisis loan to buy a cooker or a bed because they considered that it was not a crisis or a risk to health to be without a bed or a cooker?

The Prime Minister: I am not going to comment on things that the hon. Gentleman suddenly puts to me. He is aware that the amount that has been allocated to the social fund is very similar to that which has been spent in past years—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must hear the answers that are given.

The Prime Minister: The amount that this Government spend on social security benefits of one kind or another is £50 billion—greatly in excess of that spent before.

Q7. Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Shephard: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Royal College of Nursing has set a very good example to the rest of the trade union movement in its attitude to industrial relations, especially in its refusal to go on strike? Does she consider that its attitude may have something to do with the fact that, according to today, The Guardian, it has been refused a place to set up its stall at this year's Labour party conference in Blackpool? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The same rules apply to both sides of the House.

The Prime Minister rose [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is intolerable for questions to be asked but for the answers not to be heard.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that the Royal College of Nursing is a most excellent professional body that sets extremely high standards. It does not believe in going on strike. It puts its commitment to its patients first. I should have thought that that would be applauded by both sides of the House.

Mr. Turner: The Prime Minister will remember a visit that she paid to my beloved Bilston, where she purchased two large hat pins. In view of her alleged disagreements with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, were they purchased for deflationary purposes?

The Prime Minister: I warmly endorse and applaud the policies of both my right hon. Friends to whom the hon. Gentleman referred. Sometimes I want hat pins to stir some Opposition Members.

Q8. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 21 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the introduction of a national identity card would not only help to control crime but would help with football hooliganism and under-age drinking, and should be feared only by those who have something to hide?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary answered a question on that matter earlier. A number of cards are used for different purposes. They may be used to purchase drink, to ensure that one is over age, and they may be needed in football grounds. I doubt whether the case has yet been made for a compulsory system of national identity cards, with all that that means. Nevertheless, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has asked the police to update their views on the matter. We would need to make a strong case, and to prove it before a compulsory system of national identity cards is ever introduced.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Leader of the House tell us the business for the next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 25 JULY—Remaining stages of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill [Lords]

TUESDAY 26 JULY—Opposition Day (19th Allotted Day). Until about Seven o'clock there will be a debate entitled "The Inadequacy of the Government's Transitional Scheme on Housing Benefit". Afterwards there will be a debate entitled "The Safety of and Service to the Travelling Public". Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Motions relating to social security regulations. Details will be given in the Official Report.

WEDNESDAY 27 JULY—Motion relating to the statement of changes in the Immigration Rules.

Motion on the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (Codes of Practice) Order.

Motion relating to the Education (School Teachers' Pay and Conditions) Order.

Motion relating to the Building Societies (Transfer of Business) Regulations.

Motion to take note of EC document on social legislation relating to road transport. Details will be given in the Official Report.

THURSDAY 28 JULY—Motion for the Summer Adjournment.

Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.

FRIDAY 29 JULY—Debates on the motion for the Adjournment.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords Amendments and Messages which may be received.

Monday 25 July 1988: 6048/88: Social regulations for road transport.

Tuesday 26 July: Child Benefit (General) Amendment Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1227)

Income Support (General) Amendment No. 3 Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1228)

Social Security (Credits) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 1230)]

Mr. Dobson: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement. It is an improvement on last week's statement in that, at least so far, no guillotines are proposed for the forthcoming week.

To save the Government legislative time, will the Leader of the House tell us whether the Government propose to accept the Lords amendments to the Health and Medicines Bill and abandon proposals to charge for dental and eye examinations?

Will the House have an opportunity before the end of the Session to debate the proposals for phase 2 of the new parliamentary building in Bridge street? Will that be a substantive motion so that work can go ahead?

In view of the Leader's wider duties to protect the interests of this elected House as a whole and Back Benchers in particular, is it not shameful that he has failed to establish a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? If Scottish Tories are too idle to serve on their own Select Committee, surely the legendary discipline of Tory Whips could be used to get some English volunteers. Will he either set up the Committee or arrange for a debate so that he can explain to the people of Scotland why they are being treated with such contempt?

Does the Leader of the House recall promising on Thursday 7 July that a Defence Minister would write to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), who unfortunately cannot be here this afternoon, and explain how it was that, in May 1984, the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley), then a Defence Minister, told the House: when the Government agreed to pay compensation to a woman because she was strip-searched at Greenham common at that time?

"No such strip searches have been carried out at RAF Greenham common."—[Official Report, 24 May 1984; Vol. 60, c. 552.]

Having received a copy of the letter which seeks to explain away all this, may I ask the Leader of the House to arrange for the Member concerned to come to the House to face the music because the letter contains contradictory claims about what happened which would not come well from a petty criminal in a magistrates' court? Surely the Leader of the House cannot expect my hon. Friend to accept the explanation that the Minister did not understand that for the police to force a woman to take off her clothes—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We are discussing the business for next week. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will confine his questions to that.

Mr. Dobson: This issue should have been on the business for this week. All that I am asking is that the Leader of the House makes sure that the right hon. Gentleman who gave that misleading answer comes to the House to explain how it came about.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has asked me four questions that are nearly about next week's business. First, he asked me about the Health and Medicines Bill. As he knows, the Bill is still before another place and it would not be appropriate for me to discuss in any detail matters which are being dealt with by another place. However, the discussions in another place did not produce any new arguments in relation to the introduction of optical and dental examination charges. We remain of the view that it is right to introduce such charges. Our proposals rightly exempt those whose circumstance are such that they cannot afford to pay. We do not accept that those who are not exempt will be deterred from seeking treatment because of the charges. The charges are part of a package which will make a significant contribution to the improvement of primary health care.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about the new building Sub-Committtee report, I confirm that it is my intention to arrange a debate on the report in the spillover. The terms of the motion are, perhaps, best left for discussion through the usual channels.

I am sorry that, in spite of having said this to the hon. Gentleman a great many times, he still does not understand the position with regard to the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. I have made proposals to the Opposition which were unacceptable to them, and that is why the Select Committee has not been set up. I have stated my willingness to hold a debate on this matter. The timing of the debate is best left for discussion through the usual channels.

The hon. Gentleman's remarks about my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley) were absolutely disgraceful. I shall see to it that the letter of explanation that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces sent to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) is published so that people can see the explanation that he gave. My right hon. Friend stands by the answer that he gave on 21 May 1984, which was based on a Ministry of Defence police investigation which found no evidence to support the allegations of strip searches at Greenham common. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras has totally misunderstood the proceedings that took place in the Newbury court.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Will it be possible some time in the future to have a debate on the issue of sanctions against South Africa so that we can examine carefully the precedents set by the previous Governments who, when apartheid was even more oppressive than it is now, far from opposing sanctions spent vast sums of taxpayers' money to encourage trade with South Africa, and so that we can probe carefully the humbug of the Opposition?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot promise my hon. Friend a debate on that next week. However, I should point out to him, in case he has not already spotted it, that with a little ingenuity on his part there are a number of occasions when he could raise the issue.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the Leader of the House accept that the proposal that was put to the Opposition parties with regard to the setting up of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs would have entailed a change in the Standing Orders of this House which would not have meant "business as usual" which is what his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland said would happen after the last election and that therefore it is not surprising that the Opposition parties found the proposal unacceptable?

Secondly, is the fact that we have not yet had the debate on the defence estimates—although the defence White Paper was published a considerable time ago, and we have received the report of the Select Committee on Defence—a reflection of the fact that the Government are finding it increasingly difficult to meet our defence commitments with the resources available? Can we expect a debate early in the spillover?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sure that the debate on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs will be interesting because, obviously, different points of view will be put, but I stand by what I said a moment ago to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson).

The Select Committee on Defence has now reported on the defence White Paper and I hope that it will be possible for me to say something about a debate on that in my next business statement.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross) rose——

Hon. Members: Welcome back.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: May I assure my right hon. Friend that there is no one in Scotland who knows what a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs is, does, or what it has ever done and they do not want to?

When can we have a debate on foreign affairs so that we can advise the Foreign Office that there is no doubt as to what happened at Katyn, and who executed 10,000 members of the Polish officer corps? There is a memorial in London that bears the word "Katyn 1940". If the Foreign Office imagines that that massacre occurred at the hands of the Germans, perhaps it can explain how that could be since there were no German soldiers at Katyn for another year.

Mr. Wakeham: I must say that I am delighted to see my hon. and learned Friend in his place and he makes his points with his usual clarity. We had a debate on foreign affairs recently, but I recognise that there is pressure for another one. Unfortunately, I cannot promise my hon. and learned Friend such a debate in the immediate future.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Rather than leave it to deepest August, could there be an announcement next week about the future commissioners from our country to Brussels? Has the Leader of the House noticed Peterborough in The Daily Telegraph, which suggests that the paramount consideration is the need to clear the Prime Minister's conscience:

"Of the 'need to do something for Leon'"

What could possibly be on her conscience that needs clearing, and should we not have a statement about it next week?

Mr. Wakeham: The present commissioners will hold their posts until the end of the year. No decisions have been taken about possible successors and the early press speculation has embraced more than one name.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Since a ceasefire has been announced in the Iran-Iraq war, may we have a statement next week from Her Majesty's Government about the future of the Armilla patrol?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government welcome Resolution 598, as well as the Secretary-General's announcement about the Iran-Iraq war. Whether that requires a statement from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is a matter that I must refer to him for guidance.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Returning to the vexed issue of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, does the Leader of the House accept that his statement today seems to be a strange reversal of his earlier commitment that there should be a debate about this matter before the House rises? Will he not accept that the Government's failure to address this matter next week shows a continuing contempt for Scotland, and that that contempt will be seen against the background of the Government's failure to offer a real debate on the future of Ravenscraig, given that the Prime Minister seems to be unable to interpret exactly the words of Sir Robert Scholey and given the prevarication of the Secretary of State for Scotland about this matter this week in the Scottish Grand Committee? Does he not accept that there should be a full-scale debate on Scottish affairs, and particularly Ravenscraig, before the House rises?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the case for a debate on Scottish affairs and I recognise that there would be plenty of hon. Members who would want to take part, but I do not accept for one moment what the hon. Lady has said. The fact that I seek to get agreement through the usual channels as to when is the most convenient time to have such a debate is not evidence of contempt for the House; it shows that I take some trouble and care about such matters.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): With a view to action next week in a statement, will my right hon. Friend please reread the Hansard for Monday's Question Time, which I believe he attended, where my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) made a statement about the disgraceful situation regarding the salary of the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland? That must receive the Government's immediate attention and should be sorted out next week.

Mr. Wakeham: It is better that the matter be sorted out properly, rather than in a hurry. The Government will, of course, consider carefully the report of the Public Accounts Commission and will give their response in the normal way.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Is the Leader of the House familiar with the exchange I had with the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs on 13 July, reported in column 352 of Hansard, when the hon. Gentleman implied that the ombudsman's letter to me, widely reported in the press, about the Barlow Clowes scandal and the case of my constituent Mr. Mullard was confidential? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it is not true that the letter bore any such inscription and that it reached the public domain after it was sent to my constituent? Will the right hon. Gentleman now confirm that it was entirely proper for the ombudsman's letter to be made public and will there be a statement from the Under-Secretary of State by next week, in reply to my letter to him, to put the record straight in this House?

Mr. Wakeham: I am happy to put the record straight here and now. I understand that my hon. Friend is writing today to the right hon. Gentleman. My understanding of the position is that, when the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration writes to a Member, he treats the letter as being in confidence, but what is done with it thereafter is entirely a matter for the recipient. I am sure that my hon. Friend was in no way intending to suggest in his comments that the right hon. Gentleman had behaved improperly.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): Will my right hon. Friend find time to debate the protection of our national monuments from unsympathetic nearby development? Is he aware that St. Paul's cathedral, surely one of the best-known and loved buildings in the world, is currently at risk from yet another series of utilitarian and soulless structures being built around it? Does he agree that the matter is too important to be decided by local planners and developers, that the application should be called in and the matter decided by the House and the nation?

Mr. Wakeham: I have heard from time to time criticisms of some of our modern architecture and of some proposals for buildings in the area of St. Paul's. That is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I shall see to it that my hon. Friend's concern is drawn to his attention.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May we please have a debate on the intolerable growth of crimes of violence and of vandalism, especially in the county of Leicestershire and especially because the Home Secretary has seen fit to ignore the Adjournment debate, initiated by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham), in which Members of Parliament for Leicestershire of all parties demanded that the request of the chief constable of Leicestershire for more police constables on the beat should be honoured? In view of the fact that not one further constable has been allowed, in spite of a doubling in crimes of violence, may we now have a full debate on the matter?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the concern of the hon. and learned Gentleman and of my hon. Friend, but it would be wrong to say that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary ignored their representations. He took them seriously and considered them. The Government's record in improving the pay, conditions and numbers of the police is a good record and I hope that it will continue to improve.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will my right hon. Friend take time next week to dig out the explanation for the building works that are taking place in Norman Shaw North? They include the installation of the most horrendous iron bars at second-floor level, at least 40 ft above the ground, which not only prevent the windows opening and anyone caught in a fire jumping out that way, but are apparently designed to stop a passing burglar with a 40-foot ladder erecting it there, in full sight of a policeman sitting in his box for 24 hours a day and three or four men on the back door. The works appear to have started and, unless something is done, will go right through the building, whereupon we shall all suffer from a lack of ventilation.

Mr. Wakeham: Decisions of that sort are taken by the appropriate Sub-Committee of the Services Committee after receiving expert advice. I shall ensure that my hon. Friend's advice is given to that Committee to see whether it has got it right.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his decision not to hold a debate on the letter received by my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House about strip-searching at Greenham common? Does he appreciate that many Opposition Members are horrified at what happened there? That intimidating procedure is used increasingly as a method of control. It is a violation of people's rights. Will the Leader of the House reconsider and hold a debate on that serious error—I use that word selectively?

Mr. Wakeham: I have nothing to add to what I have already said on the subject. The hon. Lady knows that if she wishes, she has the opportunity to raise the matter.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Does my right hon. Friend recall that last week I asked him for a debate on the increasing practice of hon. Members visiting the constituencies of other hon. Members without first telling them? In particular, does he recall that 40 Labour Members of Parliament were due to attend the Mandela march in my constituency? Is he aware that only 13 of those hon. Members actually turned up, and in consequence the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) has sent the absentees a letter asking them for a donation of £5 to help offset the deficit on the cost of the coach? Therefore, can we have an urgent debate on the funding of the Opposition and the management of their affairs? If Labour Members had not poured down the drain my gift of South African wine, they could have sold it to help offset the cost.

Mr. Wakeham: If, as my hon. Friend suggests, there are certain financial difficulties in some parts of the Opposition, I am quite sure that they will not want to use the Short money to sort it out.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does not the Leader of the House think that it is about time we had another debate about the breaches of safety that are being committed by P and O Ferries and its owner Jeffrey Sterling? Is he aware that on Saturday a fire broke out on the European Clearway? John Ball, who was working at the time and has since rejoined the strike, listed a horrifying catalogue of breaches of safety which had been unrecognised by the so-called Government inspector, including an oil leak that had been reported five weeks previously. P and O Ferries had hung a bucket underneath it and had done nothing else. It is about time that P and O Ferries instead of the National Union of Seamen was dragged before the courts.

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept anything that the hon. Gentleman says. I am bound to tell him that I would prefer to rely on Government reports by qualified inspectors rather than the hon. Gentleman's testimony. If he had been listening to the business that I announced rather than trying to work out his question, he would have noticed that he might well be able to make his point in the debate next Tuesday.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East:) A few moments ago my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister called for more debate before legislation could be introduced on the Warnock report issues. Will my right hon. Friend bear that in mind as I am sure that such a debate would be welcome?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall certainly bear that in mind, but I do not promise an early debate on the subject.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The Leader of the House was in his place and heard the exchange between the Prime Minister and the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) about the recommendations in the Widdicombe report in relation to councillors. With regard to the publication of that report next week, before the Government start their usual anti-councillor campaign, will there also be a White Paper and recommendations dealing with the position of former Ministers, who in their roles as Ministers were responsible for the privatisation of an industry, and then, when they left office, became directors in that industry? To compound that felony, they are now party to a decision to give £50,000 a year to Tory party funds. Who does the Leader of the House consider is most corrupt?

Mr. Wakeham: I am not alleging, and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is alleging, that anybody is corrupt. If he is, it is not his normal courtesy and style to do it by way of a business question. There are better ways of alleging corruption than that sort of allegation, which I do not accept for one minute. The Government are to publish a White Paper dealing with some very important questions arising from the Widdicombe report. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman and I should read it before we comment.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Will my right hon. Friend find time for the House to debate the report of the Public Accounts Committee on Her Majesty's Land Registry? Does he acknowledge that this matter was raised in an Adjournment debate on 30 November last? Will he confirm that house purchasers, particularly first time buyers, are frustrated, that they have been put to inconvenience and expense by the Land Registry delays and that there should perhaps be a restructuring of the whole system?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that it is an important report, but the Public Accounts Committee's reports are debated regularly in the House. The subjects for debate are chosen after discussion with the appropriate Committee and through the usual channels. I think that this case should be dealt with in the same way as the others.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware of the breadth of support on all sides of the House for national sports centres in England, Scotland and Wales. I know that he would be anxious that we in Northern Ireland should also have a national sports centre, a centre of excellence. Will he look carefully at early-day motion 1402?

[That this House applauds the efforts of Billy Bingham, the Northern Ireland soccer team manager, to raise private funding to purchase Stranmillis Playing Fields, Belfast, to develop a Northern Ireland National Sports Centre such as already exists in England, Scotland and Wales; deplores the decision to designate part of this attractive parkland/playing field site for development in order to attract greater interest and higher offers from developers; and calls upon the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to protect the interests of the whole community by freezing the sale of Stranmillis Playing Fields with development approval and to provide reasonable time to enable Billy Bingham to complete his fund raising in order to purchase the complete site and develop a National Sports Centre for Northern Ireland at Stranmillis, Belfast.]

Will he consider providing an opportunity at an early date for the House thoroughly to discuss the action that has been taken in Northern Ireland to thwart Billy Bingham's efforts to acquire this beautiful parkland playing field site for a sports centre for all the people, including young people, of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concern. The playing fields were declared surplus to requirements and they are being disposed of under the normal rules for the disposal of surplus land. They were first put on the market in September 1987 and they were readvertised, under revised terms, in May 1988. There is a statutory requirement to sell them at the best price. The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland is negotiating with a prospective purchaser, but other parties may bid for the land until such time as a contract is signed.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that my early-day motion 1172 "Emergency Aid in Schools" has now attracted over 200 signatures from Members on both sides of the House? The scheme is promoted by St. John Ambulance and supported by the Red Cross.

Will my right hon. Friend write to our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and ask him either to have a debate on the matter or to write to all local education authorities and urge them to undertake this course? It seems to be an excellent scheme. It is particularly pertinent to the comments of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) who is concerned about hooliganism and thuggery. If more young people learnt about first aid at school, I am sure that they would be dissuaded from participating in violent activities in their teens.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government commend the work undertaken by St. John Ambulance to promote the teaching of emergency aid in schools, in particular the materials provided for the three cross emergency aid award scheme. Consideration will be given in due course to the place of first and emergency aid within and alongside the national curriculum.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr Harold Walker): Order. I shall try to to call all those Members who are now on their feet, but it would be helpful to have short speeches—[Laughter.] I mean short questions.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): May we have a debate on catering in the House of Commons so that if work needs to be done during the summer recess it can be carried out, particularly in view of the lavish amounts of money that were spent yesterday on the junket in Westminster Hall? Bearing in mind that the thousands of people who come here every year are provided with paltry facilities, does the Leader of the House not think that we ought to improve our catering for the general mass of the public? [HON. MEMBERS: "Privatise it."] In so doing we could compare the two standards under which Tory Members of Parliament book the private dining rooms secretly—because the bookings are not published—for the lobbying organisations that pay them. Is it not a disgrace that ordinary people cannot get a cup of tea but that Tory Members of Parliament can book the private dining rooms for lavish meals at any time that they choose?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know what sort of world it is in which the hon. Gentleman lives, but I would have thought that the Westminster Hall ceremony gave great pleasure and satisfaction to hon. Members from both sides of the House and to the nation as a whole. It was a very important and successful occasion, and I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman's remarks add anything to it.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I am sure that my right hon. Friend noticed the publication this week of the excellent Green Paper on community service orders, and will have noted also the reply that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave during Home Office questions today, when he said that a Green Paper on the future of private sector involvement in remand centres may be imminent. Can my right hon. Friend assure the House that those excellent Green Papers will be thoroughly debated when we return at the end of the recess, because their provisions will make a major step towards the fight against crime in this country?

Mr. Wakeham: They are very important Green Papers and they deserve to be debated. No doubt an opportunity will arise, but I cannot make a specific promise at the moment.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on the important subject of the shortage of speech therapists and physiotherapists and its effect on the service given to young children at school? Will he study early-day motion 1383 standing in my name on the Order Paper?

[That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Government to set up an urgent inquiry into the provision of speech therapy; deplores the uneven provision of speech therapy in London education authorities which blights the progress of children at school in the much welcomed language units; regrets the evident distress of parents of children at school with speech defects who know that academic progress and personal development are gravely hindered because of the injurious consequences of qualified staff shortages; urges the Right honourable Gentleman the Secretary of State for Education and Science and the Secretary of State for Wales to improve the salaries and status of speech therapists so as to improve recruitment to a profession that suffers recruitment difficulties; acknowledges the dedicated and professional work of speech therapists and their ancillaries; regrets the shortage of speech therapists in the County of Clwyd; acknowledges the important need for speech therapy by stroke victims of all ages; and expects Her Majesty's Government to make available sufficient money to enable health authorities and London education authorities to make adequate provision of speech therapists.]

Does he understand the deep distress and worry of many parents in England and Wales, knowing that if they have youngsters at school with speech defects they are not receiving sufficient attention? What will the right hon. Gentleman do about that situation?

Mr. Wakeham: This is a matter of priorities within local education authorities and other bodies. However, there will be occasions next week when the hon. Gentleman could raise the matter, and that is his best way forward.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As my right hon. Friend knows, Jacques Delors is quite right—we are going to get dragged kicking and screaming into the United States of Europe. The reason for this, as my right

hon. Friend knows, is that the institutions of the European Court of Justice, the Commission and the European Parliament are heavily biased in that direction. Fortunately, we have an institution in this House—the European Select Committee, though unfortunately it is crammed full with unreconstructed Eurofanatics who are tribunes of the Commission and a praetorian guard for a United States of Europe——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. Gentleman wished to ask a question about next week's business.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend make a statement next week so that the House can be reassured that that Select Committee will actually represent the constituency of this House?

Mr. Wakeham: I must say to my hon. Friend, for the second time in two weeks, that he underestimates himself. If he imagines that a Select Committee that is chaired by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and on which my hon. Friend also sits is crammed full of Eurofanatics, he has a very crazy idea of what is a Eurofanatic.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): May I assure the right hon. Gentleman, in view of his continuing interest, that I am in the most robust and ruddy good health, and that I shall continue to oppose the introduction of the televising of the proceedings of this House? In connection with that, what progress has he made with his plans to demonstrate to all the Members of the House, and not just to the members of the Select Committee, the appalling inconvenience and discomfort that the introduction of cameras, sound equipment and lighting equipment will do to the proceedings of this House?

Mr. Wakeham: I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman is in good health but he is being a little unfair. We invited everybody from the House to witness the lighting demonstration that we organised, and the hon. Gentleman who—I nearly said, I regret to say—is not a member of the Select Committee——

Mr. Faulds: I should be.

Mr. Wakeham: —was there and took a prominent if not terribly constructive part in the proceedings. The Select Committee is getting on extremely well. All points of view —including tinges of the hon. Gentleman's own point of view—seem to emerge from time to time in our discussions.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Has my right hon. Friend had time to note that my early-day motion 1119 on Japanese reparations to prisoners of war has nearly 200 signatories?

[That this House, in welcoming the growing friendship between Japan and the United Kingdom, believes that this friendship will not fully blossom until the wrongs done during the Second World War to Allied prisoners are fully accepted by the Japanese Government and due reparation made.]

It seems rather strange that hon. Members who have written directly to the Government asking for their help in this matter have been told that little can be done because, effectively, the rights of the people concerned were signed away by the Government at the end of the war. Could we have a debate to decide who should be paying those people reparations?

Mr. Wakeham: As my hon. Friend knows, this matter was dealt with in the 1951 treaty of peace with Japan, as was made clear by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in a written answer on 18 May. I cannot promise an early debate but my hon. Friend will know of the ways in which he can raise the matter if he thinks that that is the right thing to do.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Has the right hon. Gentleman seen early-day motion 1397 entitled "Absence of helicopter assistance after Piper Alpha disaster"?

[That this House, whilst deeply appreciative of the heroic efforts of the emergency services to save the lives of the men involved in the Piper Alpha oil-rig disaster, is greatly concerned that an offer of the assistance of the helicopter aboad the emergency support vessel "Iolair' was ignored; believes that there is reason to assume that at least some of the lives might have been saved had this helicopter been used; and calls upon the Secretary of State for Energy to furnish any evidence he may have on this subject to the official inquiry into the disaster.]

That EDM, which acknowledges with deep appreciation the magnificent efforts of the emergency rescue services to save the lives of the poor men involved in that accident, goes on to express deep concern that those in charge of the emergency services failed to use the helicopter——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not appropriate in business questions to make a speech that the hon. Gentleman might make if the Leader of the House sets down the matter for debate.

Dr. Godman: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it will be helpful if the Secretary of State for Transport makes an early statement dealing with the serious allegations made by men on board the Iolair, that there was a failure to use a helicopter that was just 15 minutes' flying time from the Piper Alpha?

Mr. Wakeham: Of course I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concern. The search and rescue operation for survivors from the Piper Alpha disaster was initiated and co-ordinated by HM coastguard Aberdeen. The first helicopter was on the scene within 10 minutes, but, because of the intense heat, helicopters were unable at any time to operate close enough to Piper Alpha to assist with the recovery of survivors from the sea or from the platform. Many offers of helicopter assistance made after the initiation of SAR operations had to be declined because of airspace congestion. So far as is known, no specific offer of the Iolair helicopter was made to Aberdeen coastguard. It would be inappropriate for the conduct of the search and rescue operations to be debated or discussed in advance of the judicial inquiry into the disaster.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Will my right hon. Friend find time during the course of the next week for a debate on the role of the trade unions in a modern society and on whether they should seek to dominate British political parties? Does my right hon. Friend agree that such a debate would give some of us a chance to advise the Transport and General Workers' Union whether to back the dream ticket in the forthcoming Labour leadership elections?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that that would make a good and interesting debate, but I cannot promise one next week.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): The Leader of the House in an earlier response agreed to publish a letter concerning strip searches at Greenham common. I wish to tell him that that will not satisfy women Members. The Minister's case seems to rest on the phrase

"A requirement to remove all clothing other than underclothing would not have been taken to constitute a 'strip-search'."

I can tell the House that if I——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Ms. Ruddock: I am going to ask the question. A woman who is searched in her underclothes believes that she has been strip-searched. In the light of that very serious matter, I ask the Leader of the House to reconsider and to bring to the House the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley).

Mr. Wakeham: No, I will not. My right hon. Friend stands by his answer. His answer was given after a Ministry of Defence police investigation, which found no evidence to support the allegations to which the hon. Lady refers.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): In the light of the concern about the takeover bid for Rank Hovis McDougall, and given that at this moment the European Parliament is putting together a directive on monopolies and takeovers policy that will have far-reaching effects upon competition policy throughout the Community, will my right hon. Friend grant time for a debate on that subject?

Mr. Wakeham: The full bid for Rank Hovis McDougall by Goodman Fielder Wattie is being considered in the normal way by the Director General of Fair Trading, who, under the Fair Trading Act 1973, is responsible for advising my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the question of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. In those circumstances, it would not be correct for us to debate the issue or for me to make any further comments.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Will the Leader of the House consider urgently holding a debate next week on the impact of the purchase of Rover Group by British Aerospace, and in particular its impact on the town of Llanelli, where 900 workers are likely to lose their jobs? The first that they heard of it was through the media, and I regard that as an act of deceit.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman may find the opportunity to raise the matter on the motion for the Adjournment, if that is what he thinks he ought to do.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Will my right hon. Friend, in relation to next week's debate on transport safety, consider the problems faced by seamen and the residents of Dover onshore, rather than when the ships are sailing? Over 100 attacks have been made on working seamen by members of the National Union of Seamen, many of whom have now been found guilty. Moreover, people living around the port every morning at 7 o'clock have whistles, klaxons and other noise-making equipment bellowing into their homes. It seems impossible in the circumstances for the police to get to grips with the demonstrators, because the union does not seem to be helping out at all.

Mr. Wakeham: That is a matter not for me but for the Chair. I should have thought, however, that some of the points that my hon. Friend wishes to make would be very suitable for next week's debate.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that many dental patients are now waiting for up to 10 weeks, in pain, for clearance by the DHSS, and that many dentists are waiting for payment as a result of new regulations introduced in April? Will he ensure that next week we have a chance to debate the matter? Is he aware that we are receiving many letters from patients and dentists and that the problem is highlighted in papers such as the Sunday Post in Scotland? Is it not a disgrace?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman will know that he will have an opportunity to raise those matters on more than one occasion next week, if that is what he wants to do.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Will the Leader of the House find some parliamentary time next week—or perhaps better still during the long summer recess—to give some additional coaching and instruction to those Tory Members who this week have displayed a new-found interest in humour, attempting to make jokes about Zimbabwe and aviation matters and disrupting Welsh Question Time? I believe that those Tory Members are now called the League of Glasgow Empire Loyalists.

Despite the excellent attempts at coaching by the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), as assistant Government Chief Whip in charge of alleged jokes, will the Leader of the House find out whether it will be possible on our return from the recess for canned laughter machines to be brought in so that hon. Members know exactly when and when not to laugh? Will he be able to tell us all how he is to manage our parliamentary time so that we find time to encourage this new-found tendency among Tristan and his soldiers?

Mr. Wakeham: My impression is that the hon. Gentleman's question arises more from his embarrassment about his performance and that of his hon. Friends than from an attempt to get a constructive reply out of me.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall not take more than a few seconds. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who has unfortunately left the Chamber, perpetrated—unwittingly and accidentally, I am sure—a major inaccuracy in referring to the composition of the Select Committee on European Legislation. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will know, the Committee consists of six members who are broadly in favour of Community membership, six who are broadly sceptical and two who are neutral.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The political views of hon. Members have nowt to do with the Chair.

Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill

4.13 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill on Thursday 28 July 1988.

Hon. Members should submit their subjects to Mr. Speaker's Office not later than 9 am on Wednesday 27 July. A list showing the subjects and times will be published later that day. Normally the time allotted will not exceed one and a half hours, but Mr. Speaker proposes to exercise his discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer—up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of hon. Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

I also remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 29 July, up to eight hon. Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach Mr. Speaker's Office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Fast Reactor Programme

4.15 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Cecil Parkinson): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Government's future funding of the research programme being carried out by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority into the fast reactor.

The programme involves the major facilities at Dounreay in Caithness—the prototype fast reactor, known as the PFR, which started operation in 1974, and the associated plant for reprocessing fast reactor fuel. The rest of the programme takes place at a number of other authority sites including Harwell, Risley and Windscale. This is chiefly concerned with materials and fuel development, plant performance and safety.

In the current financial year, net expenditure on the programme is planned at £105 million, of which the CEGB is contributing £28 million. Of that total, some £50 million represents the net cost of the Dounreay operations.

The Government have carried out a review of the programme in the light of the expectation that commercial deployment of fast reactors in the United Kingdom will not now be required for 30 to 40 years. Our overall aim in the review has been to retain a position in the technology for the United Kingdom at economic cost. In considering the programme, we have also had firmly in mind the importance of Dounreay to the Caithness economy, and the contribution of the people of Caithness to the development of the fast reactor.

We recognise that there is continuing benefit to be secured from operation of the prototype fast reactor. We have therefore decided to fund the reactor until the end of the financial year 1993-94. This will enable operating experience to accumulate for a further five years. We have also decided to fund the reprocessing plant at Dounreay until 1996-97, to process spent fuel from the reactor. Our decisions will ensure continuing and substantial employment at Dounreay into the late 1990s.

In addition to the work at Dounreay, we have decided to maintain a core programme of fast reactor research and development of £10 million a year. The present research programme will be phased down to that level over the next 18 months. This will enable us to make a continuing contribution to the development of the technology. We shall also continue our support for the existing collaboration between European countries on fast reactor research. Moving to the core programme could mean the loss of over 1,500 jobs over the next two to three years at sites other than Dounreay.

The programme that I have set out recognises that the commercial requirement for the fast reactor in the United Kingdom is likely to be some decades away. At the same time it will retain a position in the technology for the United Kingdom at economic cost; it recognises the special contribution of Dounreay to the Caithness economy; and it provides a basis for continued collaboration with our European partners.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The Minister's statement offers some welcome, if short-term relief for the Dounreay site in Scotland, but it yet again increases the redundancies in essentially high technology areas in Harwell, Risley and Windscale. Since the Minister has made it clear that he does not see a use for a commercial fast breeder reactor for 30 or 40 years, is he offering Dounreay a role for only five to eight years? There is clearly a long time gap, which suggests a phased closure programme. Therefore, does the Secretary of State anticipate a role for Dounreay after 1993?

Does the Secretary of State agree with and confirm Lord Marshall's statement that ending the contribution to the research programme is justified, since a privatised industry would not fund such research for benefits that are 30 years away? What will be the future funding for a privatised electricity industry in that area?

The Secretary of State states that the research programme will be reduced to £10 million. What is the cut in funding and what effect will that have on the spin-off advantages of non-nuclear technology, which we have seen particularly in oil rig structures and computer controls? What skills and jobs are affected by the statement and will the Secretary of State identify them by the authority's sites in Harwell, Risley and Windscale? What future will they have for re-employment?

Finally, does the Secretary of State accept that the reality of today's statement arises directly out of the Government's programme for the privatisation of the electricity supply industry where the short-term commercial criteria are in direct conflict with the long-term national interests?

Mr. Parkinson: First, I must make it clear that this does not arise from the privatisation proposals. Had the industry stayed in the public sector, the same examination would have had to take place and we would have come to the same conclusion that there is no likely commercial application for 30 to 40 years. The privatisation issue is a red herring.

Mr. Prescott: What about Lord Marshall?

Mr. Parkinson: Lord Marshall would have had to persuade the Government to put up the substantial funds that would be necessary if we were to continue, and I have no reason to think that he would have been in any way successful.

Dounreay will be a major employer in the region until the late 1990s. It will be available as a site for other nuclear purposes should they arise during that period. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will be making intensive efforts during the nine years that this programme offers to find work to replace that at Dounreay.

I told the House that £105 million was being spent on the programme; that £50 million was being spent at Dounreay; and that the other £55 million represents the cost of the rest of the programme. I said that that would be scaled down over the next 18 months to a core programme of £10 million a year.

Hon. Members: What does that mean?

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, contrary to the assertions of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), there is no necessary connection between fast breeder reactor technology and ownership in the private sector? Such investment as takes place in Germany comes from the private sector.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the National Nuclear Corporation's design team which is working in this area has 20 years' expertise behind it and there will at some stage be a future for fast breeder technology, so that it is important to keep this technology going? However, it is perfectly understandable that, in view of long-range forecasts for fuel prices in the future, it should be put on the back burner at this stage.

Mr. Parkinson: Yes, I recognise the important work done by the NNC in this area. The best news for the NNC is that the Government have committed themselves to a major new programme of pressurised water reactors which will ensure that that important national facility and skill continue to be used.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Why has the Secretary of State taken such grave and damaging decisions before the reorganisation of the electricity supply industry and before it could give him a coherent statement of its view of consumers' needs? Why has he done this before the responsibility for carrying out research and development into all our long-term fuel needs has been reallocated, as it will have to be following privatisation?

The Government's intention to reduce participation in the European collaborative programme to a mere £10 million may well be seen by our European competitors as a cop out, and it may even scupper the collaboration. Has he taken soundings of those Governments before announcing this, or is he prepared to let our lead in this area pass to France?

Why has the right hon. Gentleman not stated more precisely the loss of jobs associated with the decision at Dounreay and in the north of Scotland? What steps have been agreed by him and his Cabinet colleagues to offset the undoubted economic damage that will be done to the north of Scotland? He has been vague on that, and that will not be acceptable.

I recognise that forecasts of energy supply needs are notoriously difficult to make, but why has the Secretary of State suddenly changed the Government's forecast from approximately 20 years to approximately 40 years? Has he simply plucked that figure out of the air?

Finally, will the Secretary of State recognise that the dismay which was felt by my constituents and many people throughout the country about this programme stems not only from anxiety about its impact on the economy of the north and those other establishments where the work is more immediately being cut, but because they have a sense that two generations of work on producing a superb British technological achievement which leads the world is being handed to our commercial competitors?

Mr. Parkinson: If the Opposition listened to the statement instead of thinking about their supplementary questions, they might hear the answers to the questions that they subsequently ask. The statement made it clear that 1,500 jobs will be lost in the next 18 months at the sites other than Dounreay. That was in the statement. There is no question—

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): How many redundancies at each site?

Mr. Parkinson: That has not yet been settled, because the distribution of the work has to be determined in the light of the new programme.

Lord Marshall has made it clear on privatisation that he would not propose to support the programme beyond 1990 and it is clear that there will be no commercial need for a reactor for some considerable time.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) talks about European collaboration, but let me remind him that at this moment the French Superphenix is out of action and the Germans, who were supposed to build the next reactor, cannot even obtain a licence for the operation of their demonstration fast reactor, so that programme is in abeyance. We are offering a continuing programme of work on fast reactors and reprocessing, coupled with a core programme of research. That will enable us to play a substantial part in the European collaboration.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the House that we have another important statement and a number of important debates to follow. Therefore, may we have brief questions, please?

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Will my right hon. Friend say a few words about Winfrith, the Atomic Energy Authority facility in my constituency, which I believe is doing some work on this programme? Will he also say a few words about the nuclear energy research programme? We all saw at the last general election that the Conservative party was the only one committed to continuing nuclear energy. I am amazed at the comments coming from the Opposition. Will he say something about our continuing research on pressurised water reactors and other areas?

Mr. Parkinson: My announcement today represents about a quarter of the work of the Atomic Energy Authority. That is the £105 million programme, of which, as I have explained to the House, about £60 million is due to be retained well into the next decade. Therefore, the authority has asubstantial programme of other work. The authority will lave to make some major adjustments as a result of this announcement, and that is recognised. The authority commands the almost exclusive use of some skills that are n short supply and we expect there to be quite a demand for the personnel that the authority releases.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Secretary of State aware that, athough his statement was cast in bland language, he is plainly saying that the fast reactor is not commercial and cannot be seen to be commercial for the foreseeable future?

The right hon. Gentleman will know better than anyone that Lord Marshall was one of the most passionate advocates of the fast reactor and that in 1974, during my period in the Secretary of State's office, he was demanding the immediatebuilding of a full-scale fast breeder reactor?

The right hon. Gentleman's statement will be welcomed because it is the first statement by a Minister in this Government hat a complete line of nuclear reactor systems is to b phased out. The many skills of those in the industry need to be safeguarded, but I hope that the Secretary of State will come clean and tell us that the decision has been dictated in part by the fact that there is a big pressurised water reactor programme from America.

Furthermoe, while I strongly disapprove of privatisation, I know hat when one privatises one does not back non-commercial projects such as the fast breeder reactor programme. One of the reasons why the whole nuclear programme in the United States has been at a halt for 10 years is that no private utility in America is prepared to build any reactor system, and that includes the pressurised water reactor to which the Secretary of State now seeks to commit us by a statutory requirement that a given amount of electricity must be generated by nuclear means.

Mr. Parkinson: I have announced clearly that there will be no commercial demand for this technology for some decades. That was not always the case. Presumably the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who supported the programme when he was Secretary of State, did not always hold the view that he now holds, or he would have made a decision, like the decision that I have announced today, to reduce this technology and its costs to a more bearable size. He did not do that.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about privatisation, and privatisation has forced us to face up to questions that should probably have been asked some years ago.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): It is extraordinary how the nuclear cookie crumbles. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made a statement with grave and far-reaching implications, which I have no doubt the Select Committee on Energy will wish to investigate in some detail. In advance of that, however, perhaps my right hon. Friend will elucidate four points.

First, what are the crucial assumptions that he has made in reaching his decision that a commercial fast breeder reactor will not be required for 30 to 40 years?

Secondly, what financial contributions does he expect to be made by the Central Electricity Generating Board and its successors after 1993-94?

Thirdly, why does he believe that the core programme of fast reactor research can be sustained on the minuscule sum of £10 million when the existing programme has cost well over £100 million and has not been successful?

Fourthly, what will be the financial level of the British contribution to the European fast breeder reactor programme? Finally, have we abandoned all intention of taking part in the possible construction of a commercial fast breeder reactor in Europe?

Mr. Parkinson: My hon. Friend asked me about the crucial assumptions. The commercial electric utilities see no possibility of ordering a commercial fast breeder reactor for the foreseeable future—for many decades—and that is very important. If there is no customer, to continue with a huge programme, which assumes that there will be a customer, is to fool oneself. Secondly, the £10 million core programme, coupled with the additional work which will be continued at Dounreay, will enable us to continue to maintain and increase our knowledge of fast breeder reactors and their working for the foreseeable future.

I have already mentioned that the European collaboration is in some disarray. My hon. Friend may have noted that, in addition to the fact that the German programme has been stalled, the Italians have held a referendum and have virtually been ordered to pull out of the European collaboration. I have had discussions with my German and French counterparts, and I shall be having further discussions, to establish how we can maintain a sensible programme that will not cost as much as the previous programme.

[Mr. Parkinson]

My hon. Friend asked whether we will contribute to the cost of a European fast reactor. I should have thought that it was clear that we do not think that there would be any purpose in making the huge £800 million investment that would be needed, and we shall therefore not be taking part in the European fast breeder reactor construction programme.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The Secretary of State referred to Dounreay being available for other nuclear purposes should they arise. Are they codewords for nuclear dumping in Caithness? Is not the clear implication of the statement, which puts a fine time scale on the operations at Dounreay, part of a softening-up process to make the area acceptable for EDRP, the European demonstration reprocessing plant, or nuclear dumping—the dirty end of the nuclear industry? Does not the future of the Caithness economy lie in diversifying out of the nuclear industry and into alternative and renewable energy resources, whose total research budget from the Department of Energy is only one sixth of the budget of the fast breeder programme?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman would be quite wrong to say that I was suggesting that we should keep Dounreay open so that it could accept the Nirex proposals. That is not the case. During the next eight or nine years, there may be other nuclear work which may be suitable for the area. I do not say whether there is, but if the facility is available the work could be done. There are possibilities of other work but they are so general that I cannot give further details of them at the moment. The facility will be there if it is needed and it will be there for the next eight or nine years.

It is clear that the hon. Gentleman does not represent the constituency that contains Dounreay. If I had announced that we were closing the reactor forthwith, that 2,000 jobs would be lost and that we hoped for a programme of diversification, he would have been the first person to stand up and start shouting. In fact, we are announcing a continuing programme and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has announced that he will work to try to ensure that other jobs become available as Dounreay runs down.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the main reason for the non-viability in the immediate future of the fast breeder reactor and other energy technologies such as liquefaction and gasification is the long-term forecast of lower electricity fuel costs? Will he also confirm that we shall be maintaining a British-based technology?

Mr. Parkinson: We are trying to maintain a position in a technology which we still believe has a future—albeit much delayed as compared with original expectations. It will be some considerable time before the fast breeder reactor is needed—if ever. We believe that the technology has been proved at Dounreay; we have shown that we can construct and operate a fast breeder reactor, which is at the moment pumping electricity into the grid. By the time we close it down, Dounreay will have served its purpose in showing that the fast breeder reactor is a technical possibility.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The answer that the right hon. Gentleman has just given is the first clear statement of what is going to happen after 1993. We welcome the fact that there are to be no immediate redundancies at Dounreay, but the Secretary of State has now said, has he not, that in 1993-94 Dounreay will close down; is that the reality? [Interruption.]

Mr. Parkinson: I am afraid that that is wishful thinking on the part of the hon. Gentleman, who is violently opposed to nuclear power in any form——

Mr. Millan indicated dissent.

Mr. Parkinson: Not the right hon. Gentleman, but the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who has been busy doing a bit of electioneering on this important issue.

The facility will not close down in 1993. What will close down in 1993 is the reactor, and the reactor employs a small proportion of the people on the site. We estimate that by 1995 there will still be 1,600 people working on that site—on reprocessing, decommissioning and security. At the end of the operation, there will still be 500 continuing jobs on the site in security and maintenance.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Following from the Secretary of State's decision, what does he propose to do with the 45 tonnes of plutonium that would have been used in the fast reactor system, which we now understand is to be deferred for 30 to 40 years? Will he bear in mind that the international collaboration has been seriously set back on three fronts—CERN, space and nuclear energy?

Mr. Parkinson: I have already said that there is no purpose in continuing with the programme, which was originally based on the assumption that commercial fast reactors would be needed early in the next century. It is now clear that they will not be needed. The Government have faced up to that and have come forward with a set of proposals that recognise the contribution of Dounreay and the need to run down the Dounreay site in a careful way over a long period. They also recognise that we should retain a position in the technology, and that is what we are doing.

I am not here today to discuss the other projects that my hon. Friend mentioned. We are recognising the realities of the fast reactor programme and making arrangements to maintain the technology in an economic way.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): When the Secretary of State was pressed by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on what he had said to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) about other nuclear purposes, should they arise, his reply was "After all, they are so general that I cannot go into them." But some of us have gone into them with the directorate of Dounreay. As the Secretary of State well knows, one possible purpose is reprocessing and another is the problem of what to do with those 10 Ministry of Defence submarine reactors, which must be reprocessed, monitored and stored somewhere by the early 1990s. Will the right hon. Gentleman be a little more forthcoming about those alternatives?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned some of the possibilities, but no one is prepared to make any commitment that the Dounreay site will be used for any of those purposes, although they are the sort of purpose for which it might be used. The Ministry of Defence and other bodies that have been consulted do not want to be committed to using the site. That is why I said that if the site is available and needs arise it will be possible to use it. But there is no commitment of any sort that it will be used for any purpose other than its present one.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the logic of the SNP policy—as far as such a description is appropriate—is that Dounreay should be closed immediately? Is not this announcement a positive outcome for Dounreay and Caithness, because it guarantees substantial employment until the late 1990s?

Will my right hon. Friend say anything further about the work that our right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will undertake? Can he give an assurance that it will involve the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the local authorities? Might it not be helpful if there were a meeting with the Scottish Office in the near future to consider the long-term economic opportunities for Caithness?

Mr. Parkinson: Yes, my right hon. and learned Friend will be discussing this matter with the Highlands and Islands Development Board.

I confirm what my hon. Friend said about the Scottish National party. The only suggestion that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) made was that we should extend the renewables programme. I suppose he means that we should cover Caithness and Sutherland with windmills. That is not a particularly sensible policy, and it would ensure that 2,000 people were put out of work now, with only the possibility of work in the future.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall call all hon. Members who are rising.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that this statement marks the final nail in the coffin of an economic programme for the Highlands and Islands which has been fostered by successive Governments of both political colours and which involved the Corpach pulp mill—now closed—the Invergordon aluminium smelter—now closed—and the Dounreay fast reactor programme which, in the words of the Secretary of State, is to close in the 1990s?

I refer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). Will the Secretary of State say anything more about the intensive efforts over the next nine years that the Secretary of State for Scotland will make to try to undo the structural harm done to the economy of the Highlands? I can tell him, on behalf of my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), that if they are as successful as the efforts of the past nine years made by the Scottish Office, unemployment will continue to rise and the economy will continue to collapse.

Mr. Parkinson: I have already told the House that there will be substantial employment at Dounreay. I mentioned the figure of 1,600 in the mid-1990s. That figure will slowly decline. At the end of the decade, about 500 people will still be working at Dounreay on maintenance and security. That will be a continuing commitment. Right through to the end of the 1990s, at least 500 will be employed, and there will be considerably more than that for most of the 1990s. During that time, my right hon. and learned Friend will be working hard with the Highlands and Islands Development Board to see what other jobs can be attracted to the area. At least he will have a lot of time in which to work to make this transition as painless as possible.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us who take an interest in the technology of nuclear generation are somewhat apprehensive about today's statement? Is it not possible that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was right to say that this is the beginning of the end for the fast breeder programme? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is difficult to mark time in technology? Either we go forward with others or we stay behind on our own. Will his Department do all that it can to ensure that we keep abreast of the know-how in this technology so that we can re-enter at some later time, as we will almost certainly want to do?

Mr. Parkinson: We are not leaving this technology. As I have said, we shall operate various parts of the plant for at least nine years. We shall still have a substantial research programme after that. It would not have been justified to continue with expenditure on this scale and then to invest another £800 million in a European fast reactor, knowing that there was not likely to be a commercial customer for the technology for decades. We have faced up to the realities of the fast reactor programme and we are retaining a position in it.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): This is a sad and difficult, but correct, decision. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on facing up to the issue rather than postponing the decision. With the continuing low price of uranium and the comparative success of other reactor types, it must be right to reduce expenditure on the fast reactor, whose prospects are comparatively poor.

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his commitment to the rest of the nuclear programme, and in particular to the PWR programme, is undiminished? Will he see whether research staff can be transferred from the fast reactor to the PWR programme?

Mr. Parkinson: I am happy to confirm to my hon. Friend that the Government remain committed, as they were in their election manifesto, to maintaining a substantial nuclear programme. I was at Sizewell on Monday and I have bad news for the Opposition. Sizewell is running ahead of schedule and all the signs are that it will be built to time and to cost and that it will be an efficient station pumping electricity into the grid in 1994. I have set up an inquiry into Hinkley Point. I have had no other applications from the CEGB. I understand that there will be two more. The Government remain committed to maintaining a substantial nuclear programme.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Given that fast breeder reactors are unlikely to be commercially viable, at least for decades, is not the only responsible decision that any responsible Government could take that which my right hon. Friend has announced this afternoon? Is it not clear that the logical conclusion of the energy policies of all the Opposition parties would have been the decimation of

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

Dounreay—and of the whole of the rest of the British nuclear industry—a long time ago? So their indignation this afternoon is quite synthetic.

Mr. Parkinson: My hon. Friend has identified the Opposition's problem. That is why they sit muttering and shouting from sedentary positions. They are wholly opposed to the entire nuclear programme. Had they been in power, they would have closed Dounreay years ago, and thousands of other people in the industry would have been put out of work.

Short Brothers plc

4.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Viggers): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement about Short Brothers plc.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland informed the House on 29 June that we are seriously interested in possibilities for privatisation. We are, therefore, actively seeking the return of Short Brothers plc to the private sector from state ownership. I wish to make it clear that the Government are ready to consider suitable proposals that might lead to the acquisition of Short Brothers by private sector interests. I invite organisations which can secure the necessary financial backing to come forward as soon as possible.

The Government would prefer to transfer the company as a whole to the private sector. We would not, however, rule out the sale of the different parts of the business to separate interests.

In considering any proposals, the Government will give full weight to the contribution that a continuing viable business could make to the Northern Ireland economy.

My statement today follows the Government's consistent approach throughout the United Kingdom of seeking to replace state ownership with the benefits and opportunities that flow from effective private sector leadership. Those benefits have been clearly demonstrated in the companies that have already been privatised.

Shorts has many achievements to its name, especially in exports, and it is an important contractor for the Ministry of Defence. The Government believe that the future of a strong viable business at Shorts is best served not by continued dependence on public ownership, but by the disciplines and opportunities of the private sector. Returning the company to private ownership, therefore, offers the best prospects of its future development and levels of employment in the longer term.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): I hope that the Under-Secretary will not misunderstand if I welcome him to the Dispatch Box. We have read a great deal about the Government's intentions towards Government-owned companies in the North of Ireland, but the presence of Ministers in the Chamber to make those intentions clear has been rare. Even the Under-Secretary will have to agree that the Opposition, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), have had to go to great extremes to encourage the Under-Secretary to make a statement before Parliament rises at the end of next week.

Although the statement has been made today, the Under-Secretary must agree that it is very short on what will happen to Shorts and long on the Government's intentions. We believe that it is regrettable that the future of Harland and Wolff will still be subject to conjecture and uncertainty. The future of Shorts should be determined as quickly as possible. I am sure that the Minister agrees that we are witnessing the continued victory of Thatcherite economic dogmatism over the real economic needs of Northern Ireland. The Minister must also accept that the Government are seeking to escape their responsibility for the industrial and economic well-being of the Province.

When will the Minister begin to understand that Shorts and Harland and Wolff are regarded in the Province as symbols of the Government's continued commitment to the economic and industrial infrastructure in the North of Ireland? The announcement today and the Under-Secretary's previous announcements on Harland and Wolff and Northern Ireland Electricity give the impression to many people, especially those in Northern Ireland, that the Government are trying to shed their responsibility for continued industrial and economic development in the North of Ireland.

I hope that the Minister will accept that the Opposition's view is that Shorts should remain a publicly owned company. If it is to be privatised, I urge the Minister to accept that the company should be privatised as a whole and not broken down into its three main constituent parts. Further, I urge the Minister to accept that guarantees about job losses must be obtained. The Minister must surely accept that, if the company is privatised and there are large-scale job losses, that will seriously undermine not only the economic development of Greater Belfast, but that of Northern Ireland as a whole.

May I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with your permission, ask a number of specific questions? First, will the Minister state whether the Government intend to introduce any capital restructuring of the company prior to privatisation? If so, will it require the approval or the agreement of the Commission in Brussels, as occurred with the privatisation of the Rover Group?

Secondly, what will happen to the proposed $60 million order from the Pentagon if the company is privatised?

Thirdly, what prospect is there of Government funds for the company, especially for the new 90 to 100-seater Jetfan aircraft experiment?

Fourthly, can the Minister confirm that both Boeing and McDonnell Douglas have been approached to take over Shorts, but have declined?

Fifthly, what consultations have taken place specifically with the management, but, more generally, with the work force?

Sixthly, can the Minister confirm that the losses for this financial year are likely to be about £130 million?

Seventhly, if divisions are sold separately, will the Minister give a cast-iron guarantee that the important missiles division will not be sold to foreign competitors?

Short Brothers is a company of which all of us can be proud. I am sure that the Minister agrees that it is operating on the very frontiers of new and high technology —in many aspects exciting technology—and that it would be a disaster for the company to be run down and the highly trained and skilled work force to be lost, not just to Belfast but to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Viggers: I shall deal first with the hon. Gentleman's last point. We fully recognise the importance of Shorts and its skilled work force in Northern Ireland, and we pay due regard to their interests.

The hon. Gentleman said that the statement was short on what will happen. That is true, because what we have announced today is our intention to move the company to the private sector. The future of the enterprise will very much depend upon the intentions of those who approach us and negotiate with a view to undertaking parts, or the whole, of that operation.

The hon. Gentleman's question gives me the opportunity to say that the Government recognise the direct interest of Shorts' suppliers, customers and work force. We wish to make it clear that the Government will continue to provide support for Shorts while we move towards its privatisation. I especially wish to confirm the Government's continuing commitment to the statement, first made in a parliamentary answer on 23 December 1981, that the Government will stand behind the company.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Government's commitment to Northern Ireland and their intention to improve employment there. I am very proud of the fact that unemployment in Northern Ireland has reduced substantially in the past two years and is now some 19,000 fewer than in September 1986. That is all credit to the industry—substantially the private sector industry—of Northern Ireland, which has been successful in taking advantage of United Kingdom policies.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of specific questions. The first was whether capital restructuring will require EEC permission or authority. That will, of course, depend on the approaches that we receive from the private sector, which I have invited today. At this stage it is a hypothetical question.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the future of the prospective $60 million Pentagon order for the American National Guard. If the enterprise in Belfast—be it within the public sector, as Shorts is now, or within the private sector—can supply the American Government with orders, that prospect is extremely good. However, I cannot give a cast-iron guarantee that the order will be successful. At the moment, Shorts has been negotiating for some time with the American Government and those discussions are at an advanced stage. Whether the order can be fulfilled depends on the work force rather than the ownership of the company.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the FJX. That will also depend on the manner of approach to Shorts and the enterprise of those who wish to undertake it. The Government have not approached Boeing or McDonnell Douglas about taking over Shorts. We would welcome approaches from all quarters. In reply to the hon. Gentleman's specific question, we have not made approaches to the two companies to which he referred.

The hon. Gentleman asked about discussions with management. Those have taken place, but our first priority was to give the House a statement of our intention that the company should be moved to the private sector. He also asked for a statement of the current loss this year. The overall loss of Shorts in 1985-86 was £37 million. The overall loss in 1986-87 was £20 million. The figures for the current year have not yet been audited and it is not possible for me to make a statement on them.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the missiles division would be undertaken by foreign control and management. That will depend entirely on the approaches that we receive for the company. The number of jobs and the prospects of the enterprise in Belfast depend on its ability to produce and sell products that customers want to buy. We wish it well.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the House that we are now eating into the time of some very important debates. I hope that questions will be brief.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): It is appalling that Shorts, which has an international reputation for excellence and is on the frontier of high technology, is to be split up by the Government and sold off in parts. It amounts to the fact that commercial vultures will come along. When they have picked the bones clean, they will go elsewhere. Privatisation may be all right for England where the economy is strong, but that cannot be said of Northern Ireland where this action and decision will upset a very fragile economy.

Is the Minister aware that the excellent work force of dedicated and skilled men will deeply and bitterly resent the Government's decision? That applies not only to the work force, but to the people of Northern Ireland. Will the Government think again about this matter in view of the high unemployment in Northern Ireland—and I adopt and echo the comments of the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall)—and ensure that they will not sell the company in part? Will they reconsider? If they have to sell it, they must sell it in one piece and ensure that it is maintained as a viable unit.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman cannot have heard my statement in which I said:

"The Government would prefer to transfer the company as a whole to the private sector. We would not, however, rule out the sale of the different parts of the business to separate interests."

We have certainly not ruled out the transfer of the company as a whole.

With regard to the future of Shorts in private sector ownership, 17 major businesses have been privatised in the United Kingdom including the British Airports Authority, Rolls-Royce, Royal Ordnance, British Airways, British Telecom, British Gas, British Aerospace, Jaguar, and Cable and Wireless and 655,000 jobs have been moved to the private sector. Those who work within the new private sector areas are very pleased that that is the case. For instance, the profits of the National Freight Corporation have risen from £4·3 million in 1981 to £370 million in 1986. The hon. Gentleman is unnecessarily gloomy. There is no reason why the enterprise should not have a profitable and successful future in private enterprise.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): This statement can only add to the distress of those who are unsure and uncertain whether they will have a job should the proposal proceed. There are very special circumstances in Northern Ireland where there are more people unemployed than currently work in the manufacturing sector. Is the Minister aware that the proposals to privatise Shorts, Harland and Wolff and Northern Ireland Electricity collectively are perceived as phased British economic withdrawal from Northern Ireland? That perception is there and is causing concern. Overseas investors will be watching what happens very carefully and this proposal may cause them to consider further whether to invest in Northern Ireland if the Government are seen to pull out from our major employers.

I am not reassured by the statement that the Government would prefer to see the company purchased and retained as one single entity. There is a let-out there. As we are not all fools and we are aware that the attractive sectors of Shorts—the profit-making sectors—will probably be snapped up by investors, will the Minister undertake, in the event of the company being broken up, to continue to fund those sectors that are not yet profitable to retain employment and give encouragement? What can the Minister say today to reassure those who question whether there is now British economic withdrawal from Northern Ireland?

Mr. Viggers: I say again to the House that the Government's preference, as stated in my statement, is to transfer the company as a whole to the private sector. That, I reassure the hon. Gentleman, is what I said and it is what I mean. However, we would not rule out the sale of different parts of the business to separate interests, but our preference is that the business should be transferred to the private sector as a whole.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's substantial point, any talk of economic withdrawal from Northern Ireland is nonsense. The Government and our predecessors have provided substantial economic support to the Province. This year public expenditure in Northern Ireland will total £5 billion, of which some £1·6 billion is the amount of the United Kingdom subvention to Northern Ireland. That enables the Northern Ireland Office and my Department in particular—the Department of Economic Development—to fund a very wide range of programmes through the Industrial Development Board and the Local Enterprise Development Unit which are highly successful and have led to a wide range of investment and employment opportunities. That is why we are so proud that unemployment has fallen in Northern Ireland.

It is necessary for us to take account of the manner in which money is spent to ensure that we obtain good value for money. In that way we can have some confidence that the level of unemployment will continue to fall leading to more confidence and prosperity in Northern Ireland.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Will the sale of the company be conditional upon the purchaser maintaining Shorts at Queens Island for a five-year period as a minimum? If the company was sold to a foreign aircraft company which decided to rationalise its product line, it is conceivable that it might want to move its production facilities to its own factories which might be outside Northern Ireland. That undoubtedly would be a serious blow to the employment prospects in the Province. On that same point, are the Ministry of Defence contracts, particularly those for the Short Tucano, absolutely secure, no matter who buys the company?

Mr. Viggers: On the first point, I assure my hon. Friend that employment in Northern Ireland is the main basis upon which financial support is given to industry. It would certainly be the Government's continued intention to support enterprise, industry and employment in Northern Ireland. In my statement I said that the Government would give full weight to the contribution that a continuing viable business could have to the Northern Ireland economy—and that of course is in Northern Ireland.

I am pleased that the Tucano project is now making good progress with further deliveries to the Royal Air Force. That contract is held by Shorlac and I see no reason why it should be disturbed by any proposals that we have to switch the operation to the private sector. In common with the general point that I made, I think that the private sector would have enhanced opportunities to seek further export orders for the Tucano aircraft.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Now that the decision has been made to sacrifice jobs on the altar of Tory ideology, will the Minister give a commitment to the House that if Shorts is to be sold off in separate sections to separate interests, some parts will be based in rural Northern Ireland so that the imbalance in employment can be rectified and so that all the people of the North of Ireland can benefit by this decision, however dubious?

Mr. Viggers: I am not sure how many times I must repeat that the Government would prefer to transfer the company as a whole to the private sector. As to spreading its operations around Northern Ireland, the hon. Gentleman will well know that there are almost 100 jobs at Shorts in west Belfast. It is not for Government, if the company is in the public sector—certainly not if it is in the private sector—to be dirigiste about where the operation should be. I do not think that it would be appropriate for the Government to make conditions about the transfer to the private sector. To that extent, I completely contradict the Government's—[Interruption.]—the hon. Gentleman's assertion that we have sacrificed jobs.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Is not the reality, as opposed to the theoretical structure, that the Northern Ireland Vote is paying for the high cost of the Ministry of Defence's change in specification of the Tucano, which ought properly to fall on the Ministry of Defence's Vote rather than on the Northern Ireland Vote? As long as both are part of Her Majesty's Government, that problem does not present itself in a form that has to be resolved. If the company is privatised, it will. As my hon. Friend is speaking for Her Majesty's Government, not only the Northern Ireland Office, can he tell us whether the cost of the changes in specification will, after privatisation, be paid for by the Ministry of Defence or his Department and, if by neither, by whom they will be paid?

Mr. Viggers: The terms on which the Tucano contract was entered into by Shorts and the Ministry of Defence were effectively a fixed-price contract, which meant that Shorts would pay the cost of modifications and alterations to meet the contract. Who will meet such obligations will be a matter for consultation between the successor to the Tucano operation and the Government.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Does the Minister agree that Shorts is important to employment in Northern Ireland? Its dependence on defence contracts and high technology and its recent poor financial performance, which must have a bearing on its position, show that the company should not be privatised. What assurance will the Minister give that employment will be maintained at its present level at Shorts? Will he confirm that the company is likely to make a loss this year? He has already said that it made a loss of £20 million in 1986-87.

Mr. Viggers: The company made losses in the past two years ended 31 March 1987. The figures for this year have not been audited, so I cannot make a statement on the amount of overall loss or profit. As to the primary point made by the hon. Gentleman, I deny that public or private ownership has anything to do with the level of employment. Success in winning customers, providing products that people want to buy and at prices that they want to pay win profits and jobs for companies. I have every hope and expectation that in private ownership Shorts will be able to do that.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): The Opposition cannot criticise the Government for lack of commitment to Northern Ireland; it is clear to see everywhere that one looks, and I have just been to look. Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that Shorts is a company of great capability, which may not yet have achieved its full potential? Will not privatisation add the vital element of market forces, which is the spur to higher productivity? Surely that is the best way of preserving jobs. Will my hon. Friend confirm that British bids for the company will be given preference, and will he say when it is likely to be Harland and Wolff's turn?

Mr. Viggers: We have announced that it is our wish that Harland and Wolff should move to the private sector; we are having discussions about that, as my hon. Friend will well know. I could not phrase my hon. Friend's expectation of the opportunities offered by private enterprise better than he did. The number of jobs in any company depends on its ability to produce and sell products that customers want to buy. We have every expectation that the Shorts enterprise will want to do that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall call those hon. Members who have been standing.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): How many millions of pounds of taxpayers' money have been put into Shorts? Given that the Government are proposing to sell Shorts at a knock-down price, will not this announcement join the long list of crimes committed in Northern Ireland? It is daylight robbery of the taxpayers. As the Government are so keen on ballots for trade unionists, will the Minister organise a ballot among Shorts workers to see whether they want privatisation of the concern to which they have given their lives over many years, or does democracy stop short for workers? Is it not scandalous that the Government are making this proposition in an area that, as the Minister knows—the Secretary of State is sitting next to him—is so sensitive that the plan will bring concern, shock and amazement to people who are already much bemused by the circumstances that prevail in the Province?

Mr. Viggers: It is indeed true that much public money has been put into Shorts. Shorts has been able to borrow money, which is guaranteed by the Government. I hear what the hon. Gentleman says and I recognise that Shorts' workers will be apprehensive and concerned about a move from the public to the private sector. I say to them that there is no future for a company that is supported by Government. The future lies in the private sector, where there is enterprise and the opportunity of growth. That is where the company's longer-term employment prospects lie. I am sure that, on reflection, most people will take that view.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Minister aware —quite apart from the general arguments about privatisation, which confers political power over the economy on shareholders who have no interest whatever in the social conditions of the Province—that tens of millions of pounds have been put into Shorts and Harland and Wolff? As a Minister, I had direct responsibility for the funding of Shorts' aircraft and the Musgrave dock. The money that was put in sustained and created jobs that otherwise would not have been there.

When the Minister talks about subsidy, he might mention the £13 million a week—£722 million a year—that the Government spend on the emergency in Northern Ireland. Is it not a fact that that money would be better put into economic development than into the continuation of the war? Given the role that Harland and Wolff and Shorts have played in sustaining employment in Northern Ireland, it must be obvious to anyone who listened to the statement that it, like many others made by the hon. Gentleman's Office, is a barely concealed announcement that the Government are planning an economic withdrawal from Northern Ireland.

Mr. Viggers: I have said already that, in considering any proposals, the Government will give full weight to the contribution that a continuing viable business would make to the Northern Ireland economy. Indeed, we shall give that full regard.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether it would not be more helpful to transfer the money spent on security in Northern Ireland to the economy. I can scarcely disagree with him. However, any moderately intelligent 10-year-old would know that that option is not available to the Government, nor was it to the previous Government. We have three problems—security, political problems and the economy. Our job, especially that of my Department, is to ensure that the economy plays its part in improving prosperity and employment prospects in Northern Ireland, thereby making a happier Province that will contribute to solving the other two problems.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Does the Minister accept that today's announcement will reduce the Government's influence on politically sensitive contracts? Does he accept that, even in the present position, whereby all Shorts directors are appointed by the Government, the company refuses to make any public comment on incontrovertible evidence that, by falsifying end-user certificates, Shorts' Blowpipes are getting into the hands of terrorists? Will he say what the Government are doing to discover information about that problem and make a statement about it? Does he accept that such instances will be much more likely if the company is privately controlled, especially if there is to be foreign investment in and control over Shorts?

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman is tempting me to go wide of the subject of the statement. He made allegations about the company, which I refute, but I do not think that what he says is an argument against what I have announced.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is not this selling off by the Tory Government almost getting into the political gutter? It is almost as though, when she meets the Cabinet, the Prime Minister goes around the table and asks, "What have you got to sell off today?" She turns to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and asks, "Is it not time that you sold something off, despite all the social consequences?" Will the Minister guarantee that Mr. Ravi Tikkoo, with Mafia-like tendencies, is not to be given a chance to buy into Shorts? He is the man who ordered gunmen on to his ship to drive off members of the National Union of Seamen. The Government are just about getting to the level that no one could have imagined nine years ago—selling off Northern Ireland, with all the problems that it has. They should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Viggers: Some 655,000 workers, who worked in the public sector in 1979, now work within the private sector. They recognise the benefits of private enterprise, as I trust that the people of Northern Ireland will. If we seek to insulate Northern Ireland from the economic forces that apply in the rest of the United Kingdom, which have brought massive benefits to the remainder of people in the United Kingdom, we shall do the people of Northern Ireland not a service but a disservice.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I press the Minister on defence sales? On four occasions this afternoon he has said—doubtless sincerely—that the preferred option was to sell Shorts as a whole. Could there not easily, without raising Aunt Sallys, be a situation in which some big international firms want to pick off those parts of Shorts that are extremely advanced, and leave the rest? There will be plundering of what is technically advanced. That is not fanciful. What will the Government do? Will they say, "We really prefer that it should be kept as an entity"?

In the context of the Saudi arms deal, people may have reservations about what exactly happened with arms in the middle east, but that is not the point. We are discussing a major contract. Shorts is a major company. How is it to react to a Saudi arms deal, for example? What is the fallback position?

Mr. Viggers: We shall consider all approaches on their merits and take account of all interests, including, of course, the national interest.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not think that the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) intended to mislead the House, but if he chooses to look at next week's oral questions to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, he will find a question in my name about the privatisation of Shorts. Frankly, his suggestion that he has dragged the statement out of a reluctant Government is bunk.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us get on.

BILL PRESENTED

Democratic Oaths

Mr. Tony Benn, supported by Mr. Eric S. Heffer, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Ken Livingstone, Mr. Bernie Grant, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Bob Clay, Mr. Eddie Loyden, Mr. Ronnie Campbell, Mr. Harry Barnes, Mr. Jimmy Wray and Mr. Chris Mullin, presented a Bill to provide a new Oath to be taken by the Crown on the occasion of the Coronation, and by Privy Councillors, Members of Parliament, holders of all judicial offices, all civil and military officers, Lord Mayors, Mayors, Lords Lieutenant and others holding positions of authority within the United Kingdom: And the same was read the First Time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1988-89

HOSPITAL AND COMMUNITY HEALTH SERVICES

NHS Pay Awards

[Relevant document: Third Report from the Social Services Committee (House of Commons Paper No. 547 of Session 1987-88) on Resourcing the National Health Service: Prospects for 1988-89.]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £538,303,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1989 for expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on hospital, community health and related services, including a grant in aid.—[Mr. Maclean.]

5.23 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I thank the Liaison Committee for today's debate and for drawing attention to the estimates and supplementary estimates that we are specifically voting today. I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), to the debate. No doubt, Mr. Deputy Speaker, she will wish to catch your eye and respond to the debate. She has a somewhat schizophrenic attitude to public expenditure. Some days she is in favour of cutting it, and some days she is in favour of increasing it.

At the beginning of the debate, it is important to establish just how large the estimate is. In cash terms, class XIV, vote 1 is the largest ever single vote in the history of voted expenditure. The vote covers what most of us would call in shorthand the health authorities' budgets. We are debating the supplementary estimate, which involves an amount of about £538 million, the vast majority of which is to cover the additional pay costs to health authorities of pay awards to doctors, dentists and professions allied to medicine. At the beginning of the debate, we are discussing the supplementary estimate and the review body's recommendations.

I ask the House to bear with me if, on occasion, I must quote from official documents. The debate is technical and it is important that certain matters are clearly put on the record.

The pay review body stated:

"our recommendations will result in a substantial increase in the pay bill. This flows largely from the exceptional circumstances associated with the introduction of the new clinical grading structure, which will affect the vast majority of the nurses, midwives and health visitors covered in our review . . . It is in our judgement right that the new pay structure should be sufficiently flexible to provide a fully satisfying career within the clinical field. But the cost of introducing it is unavoidably high."

I stress that the pay structure should be "sufficiently flexible" to achieve the objective.

It seemed that the review body had two objectives in mind. The first was to make a major change in the relative position of nurses in the pay league. I asked staff in the House of Commons Library whether they would update the 1974 Halsbury report on staff nurses and compare it with the pay review body's proposals. Although the results are not exactly the same, they are certainly comparable. We must take note of that objective. Those hon. Members who have fairly long memories will remember how important the Halsbury report was in its attempt more adequately to pay nurses.

The second objective of the pay review body has been summed up by many hon. Members, but perhaps best by the Prime Minister. It was not summed up most eloquently by the Prime Minister, but, as she runs the show, what she says normally goes. Therefore, it is worth paying attention to how she puts a message on the record. She said that she was anxious that those directly involved in patient care should have a pay structure that reflects their skill, qualifications and responsibilities. The review body's first objective was to lift the relative pay of nurses, and its second objective was to provide a pay structure that would keep nurses in wards rather than in administration.

The Select Committee welcomed the statement that the Government intend fully to fund the pay award. It was one of our constant pleas to the Government. I do not wish to make party political points by drawing attention to the number of times the Government rejected our plea. It is important to note what the Secretary of State said when he announced the Government's decision on the pay review report. Again, I apologise to the House for quoting, but it is important to be clear about what everybody said in the debate. In a press release, the Secretary of State said:

"In reaching this decision"— to accept the review body's recommendations—

"the Government has again demonstrated its commitment to the nurses and the other NHS professions concerned . . . The Government will be implementing all these awards in full from 1 April, and will meet the full additional costs . . . from the Reserve. In consequence, these awards will be fully funded."

That is where the debate began. From that point, certain doubts have been raised about what is meant by "fully funded". Once again, as recently as 14 July, the Prime Minister introduced some doubt when she addressed the House. In response to an oral question she said:

"The amount that has been made available was the amount that was estimated by the nurses' pay review body. That full amount has been put forward. [Interruption.] The formula used for estimating the total sum required was agreed between representatives of National Health Service chairmen and the review body. That amount is intended to be the amount which they said regrading of the structure would cost."—[Official Report, 14 July 1988; Vol. 137, c. 546.]

Again I emphasise the Prime Minister's point about what it was said that the pay review body award would cost. When one reads the pay review body's words, one realises that we are not debating an estimate but that we are looking at an estimate based on an estimate based on an estimate. That is the very point that the Select Committee drew to the attention of the House in its third report, which is the basis of this debate.

The House will be pleased that this is the last quotation that I wish to put on the record—

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Shame.

Mr. Field: Well, I may give hon. Members more quotations a little later.

The crucial quote from the review body is as follows:

"Our estimates are necessarily approximate because they themselves are based on estimates. First, the Health Department have provided earnings and paybill estimates for 1988-89 at current rates of pay and allowances, together with recent manpower figures . . . Secondly, since assimilation of staff to the new clinical scales depends upon local decisions based on a process of examining individual posts, it is impossible to predict with any certainty the numbers who will be receiving each level of pay. Our calculation of the cost of the recommendations for these staff is based on an estimate by the Health Departments of the numbers which in their view will be placed in each of the new grades. For these reasons, the actual cost of our recommendations may well differ from our estimates".

I shall repeat the last sentence because it is crucial to this supplementary estimates debate. After listing the basis of the estimates based on the estimates of the estimates and coming up with that figure, the pay review body stated:

"For these reasons, the actual cost of our recommendations may well differ from our estimates".

That has led us to the current position.

Late last night I wrote to the Under-Secretary of State listing some of the questions which I hope will be answered in this debate. In order not to disappoint my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), I may well quote from them a little later.

It is clear from the press reports and the information that we are getting back from the local areas and our contacts with those in the nursing profession that the regrading is not going as smoothly or as positively as those of us who welcomed the Government's original statement had hoped. Indeed, there is some difficulty in answering quite simple questions about the allocation of funds from this supplementary estimate.

One question to which I hope we shall get a clear answer in the debate is: how have the Government divided the total sum? Has it been divided down on a per capita basis for the regions or according to the number and seniority of the nurses employed in those regions? Secondly, is it true, as some of us have heard, that the regions are holding back some of the money partly because they do not know how the review will take place at a local level but also perhaps because they hope to get some spare cash out of it? That applies to the regions that have done relatively well in the distribution.

Thirdly, what is actually happening at district level? Are the reports correct which Opposition Members and, I am sure, Conservative Members have received—that the districts are cash-limiting the review exercise and that because there is a cash limit local hospitals are changing or limiting the structure on to which the nurses can be fixed? If that is so, it is not only a serious matter for our consideration, but it goes back on the second objective which the Prime Minister laid down when she welcomed the pay review body's findings and the Government's full implementation of the recommendations, and said that we should have a flexible pay scale or, in other words, one large enough so that people with various skills, abilities and training can, at the end of the week, receive pay which to some extent matches the skill that they bring to their daily jobs. Those are the three important questions which we hope will be answered before the end of the debate.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, most of the debate will be used to discuss the pay awards and the funding of this year's increase in pay, but although many of us are concerned only with the nurses, the estimate does not relate only to nurses. It also covers doctors and their pay award. Can the Minister enlighten the House about reports that the money available for the doctors' award may be insufficient to fund their increased subscriptions for medical defence insurance, two thirds of which will be met for the first time by the health authorities? What will happen to the Whitley council pay awards? I know that the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) hopes to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, in a moment, and will no doubt raise that point.

The current position is compounded with irony. The reason why the Select Committee, many hon. Members who are not members of the Select Committee and many outside organisations which are concerned with the National Health Service pleaded with the Government to fund this year's pay award fully was to take out of the Health Service debate the element of uncertainty that arose in previous years when the pay award was not fully funded. We have a clear statement from the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State down that the Government will fully fund the award, yet there is massive uncertainty again in the National Health Service about the position on pay and how the pay bills will be met in October this year.

So that I do not disappoint my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, I refer the House to paragraph 26 of the third report of the Select Committee on Social Services. Some time ago, we drew attention to the nightmare that we thought might exist if the Government appeared somewhat mean in implementing their pledge of fully funding the pay awards. We stated in the report:

"The most immediate effect of the Nurses' Pay Review Body Report will be to increase uncertainty about the budgetary situation in the autumn when most of the award will become payable on a back-dated basis. There is no certainty at present about whether the sum allocated in the Supplementary Estimates will be sufficient to meet the full additional cost to health authorities of the pay review body awards."

Since the publication of the report the number of questions to which we need answers has increased. I listed three of them earlier and I hope that the Minister will take them on board. In the letter that I wrote to her last night, which I expect she did not receive until this morning, I listed other questions which I should like to draw to the attention of the House. I for one am uncertain about the level of the basic pay increase for those nurses who will not get an increase in pay because their position has been regraded. I have asked questions about the basis of allocating the total sum and whether it was on a per capita basis, the RAWP basis, or on the pay bill basis.

Can the Minister tell us something about the instructions that the Government have issued to the regions and districts about implementing the pay award? Do those instructions—I am sure that they exist—tell local health authorities that they should get on with the regrading exercise in the spirit of the review and that they should not be concerned with the total cost, or are the Government anxious to limit the cost of the findings of the pay review body? If that was their original intention, and given the extent of disquiet, will the Government think again and issue new instructions? What steps will the Government take to ensure that all the additional funds, for which I hope we shall vote today—without a Division—will be spent on pay and will not be earmarked for other projects within the Health Service?

It is not my intention to argue a case other than that we are considering an original estimate, which represents the largest single estimate, in cash terms, for health authorities. I do not dispute that, in their initial response, the Government were anything but proper and generous to the nurses and the other groups when they said that the pay award would be met in full. Sadly, however, we are a little older and a little wiser since the Government made that first statement and we know that life in the real world is rather complicated.

Since the original Government statement regional and district health authorities have had to try to implement the Government's intentions and there have been two reactions. First, nurses are beginning to say, privately and publicly, that they do not believe that they will get the pay increase that they thought they would get as a result of the regrading arrangements. I am not talking about those who will not be regraded and who, therefore, will receive a modest pay increase—that was the intention all along—but the remaining 85 per cent. who were led to believe that they would receive a substantial increase in their pay. The nurses' disquiet about their pay is spreading a degree of despondency within the Health Service the like of which has not been seen since before the Government announced their intention to implement the pay review body recommendations in full.

Secondly, if additional funds over and above those that we are debating today are not made available in the autumn it is clear that, as well as increasing staff demoralisation, looming on the horizon will be the prospect of further cuts and ward closures. When the Minister replies I hope that she will say that the Government have listened carefully and that they will meet the issues that we have raised.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): The hon. Gentleman has referred to cuts and closures, but I am sure that he would be the first to agree that it is not just a question of finance. What does he think about the small minority of consultants who are causing tremendous problems in the regions and districts? Last week in my district health authority, west Essex, a theatre had to be closed to be cleaned. That meant that the anaethetist lost his session and that he did not have much to do. He was asked to go five miles up the road to St. Margaret's hospital in Epping to work with the surgeon. That would have helped a lot of people with serious problems who needed operations. However, the anaesthetist refused to do so and that meant patients had to be turned away and operations cancelled. The senior consultant anaesthetist of the district, rather than telling the man that his behaviour was ridiculous, warned surgeons at St. Margaret's hospital that anaesthetists would not——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that he is making an intervention, not a speech.

Mr. Hayes: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that such a state of affairs is unacceptable and that, perhaps, the answer is for consultants to have contracts with the district and not the regional health authorities?

Mr. Field: The answer to those questions is yes. I wish that the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) was as gentle with me when asking for my views in Committee.

[Mr. Field]

We are not debating a motion that criticises the Government for not giving resources to the Health Service. I have bent over backwards to draw attention to the Government's generosity, but I hope that the Government will keep faith with the nurses and, if need be, come up with extra funds.

I know that one cannot always appeal to the best instincts of the Government to achieve the right results; therefore, I appeal to their political instincts. It would be absurd for the Government to make this record allocation and then, in October, to end up with a disgruntled work force because the pay review body recommendations had not been fully implemented and because further cuts were imminent. My grandmother used to say that it is not worth ruining the ship for a hap'orth of tar. We may need more than a hap'orth of tar to ensure that the review body recommendations are implemented in full. I appeal to the Government's instincts to do right by the Health Service and also to their political instincts. The Government have funded a large increase in the Health Service budget, but this winter they must not end up in the same position as last winter.

I thank those people who helped us to draw up our report, namely our three advisers, Nicholas Bosanquet of York university, Dr. Steve Engleman of the university of Edinburgh and Dr. Ken Grant of the City and Hackney health authority. May I also thank the staff of the Select Committee, which is headed by Helen Irwin. Those of us who work on that Committee know what an extraordinarily talented group of people we have around us. The only caution I have in drawing the House's atttention to that fact is that the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State are listening. If the Secretary of State was truly interested in value for money he would poach our staff to work in his Department.

There has been an on-going debate about the implementation of the pay review body recommendations and the Minister for Health has gone on record as saying:

"I have every intention of ensuring that it"—

the pay review body recommendations——

"is carried out in good faith."—[Official Report, 12 July 1988; Vol. 137, c. 178.]

No one is seeking to doubt the Government's good faith so far, but we have enough evidence to suggest that the Government must make a firm statement about what they will do if it turns out that the supplementary estimate that we are debating and for which we are seeking approval is not enough to meet their commitment to implement the pay review body recommendations—a commitment welcomed by the House. Such implementation would raise the pay of nurses and other workers within the NHS to a better—although not necessarily a fairer—level than it has been for a long time.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This is an appropriate time to remind the House that we had a debate on this subject on 5 July. There is a great deal of interest in today's short debate and, unless hon. Members cut their speeches short, many will be disappointed at the end of the day.

5.47 pm

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) whose fair-minded approach not only to life, but to life in this House, is a model for many. His concluding remarks remind me of the slightly suspicious child who does not truly believe in the sweetshop's existence, but who suddenly finds himself inside it. He then prefers to spend his time searching around the heavily laden shelves for something that might not be there rather than enjoying the goodies all around him. Therefore, I do not intend to follow the hon. Gentleman in his study of the potential difficulties arising from what he admitted to be the most generous cash vote ever passed by way of a supplementary vote. I wish to consider some of the positive aspects.

I shall relate my remarks to the general structure and financing of health authorities and I shall consider my district health authority in detail. I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak in this debate, as my father has worked in the Health Service all his life as a general practitioner. He practises in Bury and is also chairman of the family practitioner committee.

Although I shall not say a great deal about primary health care, I take this opportunity to pay tribute to all those involved in primary health care and to all those who work in family practitioner committees for their excellent work. I pay particular tribute to the FPC of Bury for what it has done recently in computerising its cervical cancer screening system and acting as a model for the north-west. My brother also works in the National Health Service. He is an anaesthetist who works in a London hospital, so I have something of a medical background, although my own life took me in a slightly different direction.

Recent debates on the NHS in this place have been characterised by three trends—first, the lack of enthusiasm and general support from Labour Members for a subject in which they are supposed to have such a deep concern; secondly, an over-concentration on selective history; thirdly, a lack of ideas about how to deal with the future. In the most recent Opposition day debate on the subject, those three characteristics came together. Those Opposition Members who bothered to take part waxed lyrical about the origins of the Health Service. They paid full and due credit to Bevan and lingered long over the injustices intended to be put right by the shining step into tomorrow when the NHS originally came into being.

However, Opposition Members' tragedy is that that love of history, which is so much part of the Labour party's tradition, can become a quicksand and entrapment, denying them the flexibility to consider the present problems and thus develop new ideas for the future. It was lost on no one in this House that the most effective contribution from Opposition Members came from the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who made the speech that should have been made by Members on the Labour Front Bench.

Although Labour Members remember that rich heritage in a lyrical way, Conservative Members are entitled to remember another heritage, particularly bearing in mind the size of the estimates that we are discussing today. If I had spoken 10 years ago, I would have been concerned about the desperately low morale of Health Service workers in my constituency, owing to strikes in the service. I would have been asking about the low pay of nurses and why inflation had destroyed their rises. I would have been angry that the economic collapse had cost my constituents their new general hospital in the capital expenditure wash of those days, which had left the district as the only district in the north-west not to have a new general hospital in the past century. However, I appreciate we are not here to deal with history. In these estimates, we are concerned with the present and the future.

I want to consider the grassroots example of my own health authority of Bury. Those hon. Members who know the area in which I was born and brought up will know that Bury, Ramsbottom and Tottington are not part of a great rolling shire. It is not an unduly privileged area. It is as average a constituency as one could wish to find—apart, of course, from being the most important, as each hon. Member would say of his constituency. The story of that health authority over the past few years and the way in which it has coped with the finance given to it and has planned to cope with the finance given to it and has planned to cope with the finance symbolised by the estimates before us is the story of how one health authority has adapted and responded to change in a demanding world.

It is an appropriate opportunity to pay tribute to all those who work in those local services in the Bury health authority—the nurses, doctors, all the professionals in primary care in hospitals and in the community and all those who support them in the various ancillary services. It is also an opportunity to be grateful to those who administer the enormous funds that we are debating today, including Mr. Philip Bacon, the district administrator, all those who work with him and those who have been chairmen of the health authority. Great chairmen include the late Aubrey Clayton from the Labour party and the present chairman, Mr. Ted Schofield, from a Conservative background.

When talking about this size of budget, it is easy to get lost in great national statistics. They tend to smother what is really important to people at the grass roots, in the surgery, in the community, in hospital or in any other form of care. We sometimes forget that when we are talking about those vast sums. What matters is what is being delivered to the person in the surgery. When I think about that and about some of the examples of what my health authority has done in the past few years and what it can do with those sums that we are discussing today, I can see that we are in a different world from that we hear portrayed by Labour Members.

Let me quote some examples from an ordinary health authority in the north-west of England. In 1979, the number of staff employed in direct patient care was 1,020. On 31 March 1988, that number had risen to 1,307. Over the past five years, nine additional consultants have been appointed. Over the next 12 months, we hope to make five more appointments. That will mean that, since 1982, there has been an increase of 40 per cent. in the level of consultant staffing in the health authority. The number of in-patients treated in 1978 was 19,412. By 1987-88, that had arisen to 25,571. In terms of capital development, since 1979, there have been over 40 separate developments, costing a total of £17 million.

When my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister comes to the Dispatch Box to talk about the Health Service and deliver some statistics, Labour Members often express concern, but statistics are about real people. One cannot walk around a statistic, but one can walk around my new hospital, the first phase of which was completed on the 40th anniversary of the creation of the Health Service.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): My hon. Friend referred to the new Fairfield hospital. Does he acknowledge that we had been waiting for that for 18 years, that it took a Conservative Government to put it there and that the people of Bury are now benefiting from it?

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend is right. If we had been talking about this size of estimate 10 years ago, our constituents would have had the hospital 10 years earlier.

One cannot shake hands with a statistic, but one can shake hands with one of the nine new consultants whom we have appointed over the past few years. One cannot comfort a statistic, but one can comfort one of the thousands of patients who have been treated in the past year as a result of the increased efficiency in the local health services.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to come a little further north, to Newcastle, where 322 hip operations were put in the waiting list initiative for this year. That was much to be welcomed. Hip operations in an area like Newcastle are very important, as there is a large number of elderly and dependent people. I would have been the first to say so if those operations had been carried out, but, unfortunately, as the regional health authority has banned all new consultant posts for this year because of the lack of certainty about funding, those operations were taken out of the waiting list initiative. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to come north and explain to the 322 people concerned.

Mr. Burt: The point at issue is whether the resources are effectively administered. First, 15 or 20 years ago, there would not have been a waiting list for hip operations because such operations could not be done. The number of such operations has grown tremendously. Secondly, the way in which the waiting lists are constructed locally and the way in which the regions deal with their resources is a matter for those regions. The statistics that I have given are for my health authority and show how it looks after our people.

The way in which the resources are applied has to do with the way in which they are administered. Over the past couple of years, as the Health Service has come under increased scrutiny, it has become clear that what is at the root of the problem, is not money but the way in which different authorities and regions look after that money. Recent surveys, including the Sunday Times awards for district health authorities, show that the greatest problems lie in the way that some districts look after the money that they are given. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should ask why his authority has not done something else with that money.

Mr. Cousins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burt: I cannot give way because so many other hon. Members wish to speak in the debate.

The problems that underlie the estimates cannot be hidden. There is no doubt that the Health Service has problems on the horizon that must be faced—the problems of an elderly and aging population and the problems of regrading to which the hon. Member for Birkenhead referred.

We must not miss the opportunity to emphasise the positive aspects and the care with which the Government are looking at the problems of the Health Service for the first time. The difference between the two sides of the House is that Opposition Members are trapped and hidebound by history and are producing no ideas on how to deal with the problems; for them it is merely a matter of increasing the amount of money going into the Health Service. All the ideas about reform and about dealing with the problems come from Conservative Members.

I wish strongly to stress to the Minister first that there is a great deal of good inside the National Health Service. The way in which my health authority is coping with its cash and the way in which it will cope with the extra money that will come through the estimates shows that there are good district health authorities that are well managed and well run. Within those health authorities are people who have lessons for other health authorities. It may be necessary to draw good people from the National Health Service who are working in districts that are proving to be efficient so that they can go to regions such as that represented by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) and help put right the problems of administration.

We must not lose sight of the fact that there are good people in the National Health Service who must not be lost in a general view that we must have only outside advisers in the Health Service review. We must make sure that the good people who work in the Health Service and who know the system are given the opportunity to put forward their ideas about reforming the system.

Secondly, we must ensure that the scope for private health treatment and for liaison between public and private care continues. That might be a way of dealing with the problem of waiting list operations. The district health authority in my region adopted such a solution to problems of National Health Service waiting lists, liaised with private hospitals and started to reduce those lists.

Thirdly, we must remember that the patients, our constituents, the people with whom we deal are not interested in the slightly arcane problems of how a service is delivered. What matters to them is that that service is delivered. One cannot ask someone who is desperately ill whether they mind going into a private hospital. They need a job to be done, and if that job has to be done through a mixture of public and private care, it still has to be done. What matters is that the service is delivered, not the ideology behind the way in which it is delivered.

Lastly, the review should take account of the importance of building a new consensus on National Health Service spending. We realise that the National Health Service is a precious asset. Over the past few months, we have been talking about change. Today we are talking about the use of resources in the new estimates and the hon. Member for Birkenhead was kind enough to be generous in his remarks about Government spending. There is a great deal of consensus. This place emphasises differences, but if we are truly to serve the people we represent we must make the most effective use of the estimates that we are voting today. If we are to produce the best ideas of how to run the Health Service in future, those ideas must coalesce. The money we are debating today will give the Health Service a great start. With that start, with the vision of the future and the ideas from this side of the House and with decent people to administer them, we shall have a Health Service in future of which we can truly be proud.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): I begin by extending thanks to the Select Committee on Social Services for the extremely important work that it has been doing and to my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) for the way in which he opened the debate. The report produced by the Select Committee is extremely timely and is about an issue of concern to people throughout the country.

It is absolutely clear what the Government must do. They must give the Health Service enough money to pay the nurses the increases that they have been promised. If the Government do not do that, the consequences will be disastrous. Either thousands of hospital beds will have to be closed to pay the nurses their increase, or the nurses will not get their pay increase, they will feel cheated and demoralised, they will leave the Health Service, and beds will have to be closed because there will not be enough nurses. For the sake of all the patients waiting for treatment on growing waiting lists, the Government must promise tonight to pay the nurses their pay increase.

Nurses have considerable training, they do a responsible job and they work anti-social hours. Yet the problem of nurses' pay slipping behind has been a perennial one. It is absolutely clear that nurses' pay is a classic case of sex discrimination. If most nurses were men rather than women, we would not be facing that problem year in, year out.

In the past, the fact that nursing did not provide attractive long-term career prospects was masked by the continuous supply of 18-year-old girls ready to take up nursing. Not enough attention—indeed, hardly any attention—was paid to keeping experienced older nurses within the Health Service. It was assumed that every nurse who did not return to nursing after having children would be replaced by an 18-year-old girl. That was very wasteful of the skill and experience of older nurses, but it was overlooked until demographic changes meant that there now are not enough 18-year-old girls to take the place of the 30,000 nurses who leave the Health Service every year.

The Government have tried to imply that the nursing shortage is a problem only of particular nursing specialties, or only in London and the south-east, but that is not the case. At the beginning of this year, I conducted a survey of all district health authorities and 120 replied. It revealed that 83 per cent. reported difficulties in filling nursing vacancies. I should like to go into some detail about the findings of the survey, as it is still the most up-to-date survey on nursing shortages throughout the country.

It is not the case that there are nursing shortages only in paediatrics and intensive care. My survey showed that 60 per cent. of districts have shortages in mental illness nurses, 48 per cent. in theatre nurses, 40 per cent. in nurses in geriatric care, 36 per cent. in intensive care nurses, 31 per cent. in nurses nursing the mentally handicapped and 29 per cent. in paediatric nurses. We are talking about a national problem which hits geriatric wards and paediatric wards, intensive care and care in the community. It is the Government's responsibility to sort it out.

As children in Birmingham had their heart operations cancelled, it was exasperating to hear Ministers saying, "It is nothing to do with us. It is not our fault. It has nothing to do with resources; it is the nursing shortage." The nursing shortage is very much bound up with the question of pay.

Nurses join the Health Service because they want to help others, because the work interests them and because they believe in the National Health Service. The Price Waterhouse survey carried out on behalf of regional chairmen confirmed that that is the case. Nurses leave the Health Service because of pregnancy. They do not return to nursing after having their babies because of low pay and lack of job satisfaction.

Against the background of a nationwide shortage of nurses that was putting services at risk, the pay review body recommended an average 15 per cent. increase for nurses, and we welcome that. In April, the Government led everyone to expect that the pay award would be fully funded and that the Government had made that commitment.

That was reflected in the headlines at the time. The Guardian said:

"Nurses pay rise stems tide of health debate";

The Independent:

"Tory nerves calmed by 15·3 per cent. award for nurses";

The Sun:

"Loadsa loadsa money for our super nurses";

The Star:

"A welcome tonic for the NHS";

The Daily Mail:

"Record rise for nurses";

and the Daily Express:

"15 per cent. pay joy for nurses".

The Government basked in the glory of that good publicity. On 21 April, the Prime Minister said:

"the Government have decided that the cost in excess of the allocation already made for this year should be met from the Reserve."—[Official Report, 21 April 1988; Vol. 131, c. 528.]

On the same day, the Secretary of State announced that the Government would provide £749 million. He said:

"In consequence, these awards will be fully funded."

The problem is that the £749 million he mentioned was an estimate. The pay review body warned that its estimates of the cost of the pay award

"are necessarily approximate because they are themselves based on estimates."

The agreed plan was to introduce new clinical grades according to what each nurse was actually doing. The average pay award of 15 per cent., with some nurses receiving up to a 60 per cent. increase, would then be paid at the end of the year.

Managers, in consultation with the unions, are carrying out that review, but there is no sign of the relief that swept over nurses and managers in April. That has gone. Reports are beginning to emerge that at local level in all regions managers are downgrading nurses. The Nursing Standard of 16 July accuses health authorities of being cowardly. Its editorial states:

"Cowardly because they are not willing to return a higher percentage than that allocated for fear of another round of cost cutting to pay for the extra cash."

An internal memorandum from the North-West regional health authority, leaked to The Guardian, revealed that the allocation that the Government had made for the pay award was

"at least £3·3 million short."

The authority said that the options available to it included spending cuts, slowing down the regrading exercise—that is, cheating the nurses—or manipulating the regrading to reduce the cost—that is, cheating the nurses.

The Prime Minister and her health team have lately become rather shy and convoluted when talking about the pay awards. Although, when pressed, they repeat the magic phrase "fully funded", they are careful at the same time always to mention that they mean fully funding the specific sum of £749 million extra. That puts local managers in an invidious position. Should they respect the integrity of the clinical grading review and risk a large pay bill, for which they will not be reimbursed and which will trigger a massive round of service cuts? The size of the review body pay award and the number of nurses in the National Health Service mean that underfunding would have disastrous effects on services.

The North-West regional health authority reckons that the cost of the award will be not the anticipated 14·5 per cent. but between 17 per cent. and 21 per cent. The additional cost, if that were to be reflected nationally, would be an extra £140 million, or even as much as £360 million. If health authorities were forced to find, taking the lower estimate, £140 million from service reductions, 7,000 beds would have to be closed for a year. Regional health authorities will not be certain of the extent of any underfunding until at least halfway through the financial year. To meet a shortfall of £140 million, they would have to cut 14,000 beds for half a year.

We have to face up to these figures if we are to understand the scale of the consequences, should there be underfunding. If it were to amount to £150 million, that would represent the loss of 10,000 heart transplant operations, or 45,000 coronary by-pass operations. The Minister is laughing, but that is exactly why managers and nurses are nervous. If she were to listen to what they are saying, she would be less complacent. It is because they are facing up to the figures while she is not that they are concerned.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I think I heard the hon. Lady say that we should have to give up 10,000 heart operations. Will she please tell the House how many heart operations we used to do and how many we do now? It is not 10,000, or anything like it, thank God.

Ms. Harman: That is absolutely beside the point. [Interruption.] Yes, it is beside the point. I am trying to explain to the House, but the Minister fails to understand, that there is great uncertainty and fear at local level. People believe that there is to be a trade-off between the pay awards and nurses. It is about time that the Minister understood—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) says from a sedentary position that the uncertainty and fear are spread by me and my friends. That is not so. We are responding to genuine concern at local level.

I intend to read letters from nurses who express the fear that is felt at local level. No wonder that managers and nurses are nervous. It is no good trying to improve nurses' morale by improving their pay if at the same time their pay increase is funded by cuts in services. Nurses' complaints have never been just about pay. They are also about cuts in services.

Cuts in services due to the underfunding of pay awards have been bad enough in the past four years. I remind the House that there was a £32 million shortfall in 1984-85, a £36 million shortfall in 1985-86, a £12 million shortfall in 1986-87 and a £24 million shortfall in 1987-88. No wonder managers fear underfunding for this round. If the underfunding this year is as large as £140 million, the cuts will be catastrophic. It is fear of underfunding that is interfering with and gnawing away at the base of clinical regrading.

The pay review body warned that it is difficult for local managers to insulate their judgments about grading from their preoccupation with budgetary constraints. Indeed it is. Nurses suspect that managers are downgrading or undergrading nurses to fit the amount of money that they think they will get, rather than risk the service-cutting consequences of sticking to the regrading. They are aided and abetted in this by DHSS guidance, which the unions fear undermines clinical regrading.

I shall give just one example. I said at the beginning of my speech that the idea was that nurses would be graded according to what they do and that it would not involve restructuring, yet the DHSS has told managers that they are to be allowed only one grade G post per ward. If two sisters on a ward have equal responsibilities that ought to qualify them for grade G, they will have to compete for one post. Instead of the two sisters receiving the pay increase that they are expecting, only one will get it. The other will be downgraded. The clinical grading review was supposed to improve morale, not to set nurse against nurse and leave the profession feeling cheated.

I shall read letters from nurses at local level to scotch the complacent view of the hon. Member for Gillingham, who thinks that this is my invention. A nurse in West Yorkshire wrote:

"Our AUGM"—

that is, the assistant unit general manager—

"has said that the Authority must work to a 15 per cent. budget and that unfortunately most of us will be disappointed."

A nurse in Dorset wrote:

"If the grading process is not implemented fairly it will only cause more nurses to leave the National Health Service and lead to further industrial action which may on this occasion prove fatal."

It is signed

"from one very discouraged nurse."

A nurse in Cheshire wrote:

"It is also becoming increasingly apparent that managers are taking every opportunity to downgrade job descriptions."

I shall not read out all the letters of protest, because there are so many of them, but they show that this does not seem to be an exercise that is successfully raising nurses' morale.

If regrading is used to cheat nurses out of the pay increases that they are expecting, they will become even more demoralised. Nurses' hopes will have been raised only to be dashed. I had hoped that we should not be accused of being alarmist, but if we are accused of being alarmist and of stoking up fear it would be very easy for the Government to reassure people by simply saying that they will fund the pay awards in full. I notice that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), said in a Scottish Office news release:

"I deplore the campaign of rumour and innuendo which COHSE in Scotland are mounting".

However, he then said that the additional funding of £92 million for Scotland is expected to meet, without shortfall, the cost of the review body pay award to nurses in Scotland. But the question that is begged is, what if it does not do so? Everybody is keeping quiet about that.

It is not as though we cannot afford to give nurses decent pay rises. The National Health Service is not too expensive. We spend less, as a percentage of our national wealth, on health than America, France, Germany, Italy or Holland. The Treasury has enough money available to enable the Minister to say from the Dispatch Box that managers can carry out the grading review with integrity, because it will be funded.

The Treasury has deliberately underestimated revenue by up to £3 billion. It is receiving more tax than it admits, and it is selling more assets than it expected to sell. It is doing so to pull the wool across the eyes of the hon. Lady, who is in a spending Department. It is trying to distract her from calling for extra spending. But the NHS need not be kept short of cash. The Secretary of State for Health could pay the nurses and keep beds open.

Earlier this year, the Government were faced with widespread protests about cuts in services and the declining morale of nurses. It was that massive protest, supported overwhelmingly by the public as well as by those providing health care, that forced the Government to promise full funding of the pay award. If the Government betray the nurses, they will cause a storm of protest far greater than that which we saw earlier this year.

The Government need not allow uncertainty to continue and morale to ebb. All that needs happen is for the Minister clearly to announce tonight that she will fully fund the pay award. We shall listen carefully to her words, as will managers and nurses all over the country. It is no use the Minister saying that she will fully fund the estimated costs. Estimates, by definition, can be wrong. The Minister must say that she will fully fund the pay award. If she does not, it will be clear that managers must choose between cutting services or cheating nurses. The Minister should end the fear and uncertainty that has cast such a shadow across the Health Service.

When the pay award was announced and the Government declared that it would be fully funded, the Secretary of State said:

"It is good news for the staff, good news for the patients and good news for the country."

That promise must not be broken.

It is not just nurses who are concerned about their level of pay this autumn, because there is a legacy of anger among other workers. There is a resentment among porters, cleaners and catering staff, who have been offered only 5 per cent. They already make up a large proportion of the working pool of people who, although they work long hours, have to rely on benefits to supplement their income. There is also concern about laboratory staff pay levels. Medical laboratory scientific officers are paid about 50 per cent. less in the Health Service than they would be in the private sector. As a result, it is difficult to recruit and to keep those staff. Laboratories are short-staffed, with those remaining coming under more pressure. One district health authority has been compelled to suspend its cervical cancer screening because of a backlog of smears for analysis. There is no chance of the Government, in paying the nurses, robbing Peter to pay Paul. They cannot take from other parts of the pay bill to finance the nurses' award.

I ask the Minister to take this opportunity to make a statement about the Government's plans to introduce eyesight test and dental check-up charges. When the Health and Medicines Bill was debated on Report, not a single Conservative Back Bencher supported the Government's proposals to charge for eye examinations. The Government will face a major row if once again they bring their proposals to make those charges before the House. The people most likely to lose are the elderly. It is they who most need eye tests, and who are most likely to be deterred by charges. We should not have to wait until October for a statement on this important matter. The Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security is present and it is for her to say whether those charges are to be reintroduced, or whether the Government will drop that wretched and unpopular proposal.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): First, I must apologise to the House and to my hon. Friend the Minister for not being present for the beginning of this debate. I apologise also to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) who leads the Social Services Select Committee with great distinction in this Parliament. I fear that I may go over some of the ground that he has already outlined, but that is because there is on the Select Committee—on which it is a great honour to serve—an immense consensus among Members representing most parties on how the problems of the Health Service directly relating to the estimate we are debating should be tackled.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) will forgive me if I do not immediately follow her on the path down which she led the House, albeit that I have sympathy with the sentiments she expressed, if not the language that she used, in respect of eye test and dental examination charges. As a member of the Social Services Select Committee, I hope that the Government will take a mature attitude to what happened in another place earlier this week and will give serious consideration to the view expressed there—which was endorsed by the overwhelming majority of the Select Committee's members—that it is undesirable to charge for eye tests and dental examinations, and that, to some extent, that goes wholly against the preventive medicine campaign that my hon. Friend and other Ministers over the years have organised and undertaken in the length and breadth of the country. I say to my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench that I shall not be able to support the Government if they seek to overturn the decision that was taken in another place on that matter.

I understand that the problems of nurses and nurses' pay has so far dominated this debate. I have immense sympathy with the Government, who I believe made an announcement in good faith that they would fully fund the recommendations of the independent nurses' pay review body. However, we know that on this occasion that body did not recommend a straightforward pay increase but a complex, total regrading of nursing staff at every level. It is for nursing and other managers throughout the Health Service to undertake that very difficult duty carefully.

However, I say to my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench and to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State in particular, who I understand will be intervening later, that if in the light of a considered and responsible clinical regrading of nurses it is seen that the Government underestimated the amount that needed to be allocated for pay, I hope that they will have the courage and the determination—and perhaps I ought to address this remark to my hon. Friend the Minister and not to the Government as a whole, because DHSS Ministers must fight their own corner—to go to the Treasury and ask for further resources to meet the cost of the clinical regrading which is a critical part of the Health Service structure. It will be irresponsible and bordering on the immoral if the Government, having stated to the people of this country and to their own supporters in the House that they would fully fund the pay award, do not in the event carry through that promise and assurance.

Other statistics have been quoted relating to regional and district health authorities throughout the country. The hon. Member for Birkenhead may have mentioned our discussions in the Mersey region with the chairman of that authority, Sir Donald Wilson. He is currently chairman of all the regional health authority chairmen, so he holds a responsible and important position. His senior managers indicated to the Select Committee when it visited the Mersey region—particularly the Wirral and Macclesfield health authorities—that in their estimate it was likely to be £1·5 million underfunded, and that is after it had undertaken a well-considered and responsible nurses' regrading.

If the Mersey region, which is currently a RAWP loser, is expected to provide the necessary funds, and if there is inadequate money within the cost improvement programme to pay for the nurses needed and the regradings that are necessary, patient services will inevitably be cut.

As the hon. Member for Peckham knows—and as the Minister for Health knows—my district health authority has had to reduce theatre sessions to stay within budget. That is increasing critical waiting lists in important categories, not least orthopaedics. I have been a member of the Select Committee for more years than I care to remember—for longer than any other hon. Member has sat on any other Select Committee. That has, I hope, given me an understanding of the Health Service that not all hon. Members have the privilege to possess. It has been of immense interest to me for nearly 14 years, and I have made contact with almost every branch of medicine. It is critical that the Government reconsider. If additional supplementary resources are required, they should be provided this year.

The nurses' pay review body dealt not only with a single year's increase, but with the critical aspect of regrading. We must ensure that we retain the nurses whom we have, and encourage other young men and women to come into such a magnificent career. As the hon. Member for Peckham pointed out, we can no longer rely on the many 18-year-old young ladies who were happy to come into nursing, perhaps seeing it as a vocation, but a vocation lacking the salary to reward their skill and care. Many were fortunate to come from families that could provide them with assistance, but that is no longer so. The competition in the market place for able young women —and men, for that matter—is very great. Unless we are to lose more nurses, the Government must look again at the total cost this year following the nurses' clinical regrading.

I understand the Government's position. It would, perhaps, have been irresponsible to say, "Whatever the total cost, we will meet it." Those responsible for undertaking the regrading might have regraded more generously than was merited. There is no doubt that some nurses merit regrading and others do not. I believe that the Royal College of Nursing has in general taken an amazingly responsible attitude throughout this difficult period, and continues to do so.

Time and again the Government tell us that they are trying to achieve better value for the massive sums that they spend in the Health Service. The hon. Member for Birkenhead began by admitting that the Government had given generously. That is to the credit of the hon. Gentleman, who represents not only Birkenhead but the Labour party in this place. We do not often hear such a constructive approach to the opening of a debate on a vital issue.

The Government also say that they want better management. If that is the case, they must provide the wherewithal first to allow the Health Service to operate more efficiently and secondly to give the management the tools to enable them to make the right decisions, with proper knowledge of all the facts. They are certainly not able to do that at present. I recently visited the King's Fund college where I had the pleasure of addressing people on a course in management within the National Health Service. A number of them said to me, "We are concerned that the Health Service is not committed to management, and that the Government are not either, despite the Griffiths report and all the talk that followed its publication. If they were committed, they would be more determined to provide us with the equipment to enable us to do our job." Adequate resources for computer systems and information technology will play a vital part in enabling health authorities to provide value for money, and to enable consultants and others to make informed decisions.

The hon. Member for Peckham mentioned laboratory assistants, medical physicists and pathology staff. All those groups are vital to the Health Service, but there is a problem over pay. They are not remunerated in accordance with their skills, and, with the growing competition in the market place, the Health Service will undoubtedly be starved of people who are vital to the provision of an efficient service and value for money. Accordingly, I make a special plea on behalf of all who are employed in the professions allied to medicine.

Let me also make a plea, as I have done elsewhere, for medical secretaries. Time and again—not just during the Select Committee's current inquiry into the resourcing and structure of the Health Service, but during other inquiries—consultants have said, "We are here because of our operating skill, but we are unable to work to the extent that we should like because we have not the back-up staff." Only recently when we visited Guy's hospital, just across the river, a leading consultant said that he was losing his medical secretary because she was going elsewhere for a better salary. The hospital was unable to pay the salary that was essential to maintain that vital member of staff. I have referred outside the House to the case of Mr. Lennox Holt, a rheumatologist in Manchester, who told me that his work was being gravely impeded because he could not employ the right quality of medical secretary to enable him not only to do his job but to refer the case notes back to other doctors who would follow up the care and treatment of his patients.

Let me make two more brief points. We have severe problems with capital spending, and perhaps I could link that to my continuing concern about care in the community, to which the hon. Member for Peckham referred. It worries me dreadfully that managers throughout the country are deciding to close psychiatric hospitals—and other hospitals, for that matter. I am particularly concerned about the position of the mentally ill, but inevitably my concern extends to the mentally handicapped.

Those managers are trying to run down the psychiatric hospitals and discharge patients into the community, where there are inadequate facilities for them. There are not enough trained and qualified staff to maintain an acceptable level of care and treatment. The managers are then disposing of the hospital sites for large capital sums, many of them for development. Once those sites are lost, there will be too little long-stay hospital care for the more severely mentally ill, particularly those suffering from schizophrenia. There is growing anxiety about decisions that some health authorities are being forced to take because of the resource problems that they are facing which will result in chaos and suffering for groups within our society about whom we should be concerned.

Some time ago the Select Committee undertook an inquiry into care in the community. Some of the recommendations that we made, which have not been accepted by the Government, are as relevant as, if not more relevant than, they were when we produced our report. The Government should take a greater interest in what district health authorities are doing in closing psychiatric hospitals and hospitals for the mentally handicapped. We could produce a situation such as exists in Italy today. It closed those hospitals and people are now on the streets, sleeping on park benches, under bridges and in the call-in day centres and night shelters. Those people no longer have the care and medical attention that they require to contain their condition and enable them to maintain an acceptable standard of life.

Debates such as this give those of us who study the Health Service carefully an opportunity to express some of our deep anxieties. Such hon. Members come from both sides of the House. If the hon. Member for Peckham had tackled this subject in the caring and responsible way that the hon. Member for Birkenhead did, rather than concentrating so much on the entirely political issue of the nurses' pay review body, its recommendation and the full resourcing of the award, we might be able to find the common ground which would enable the House to produce policies and proposals, perhaps as we did when the Health Service was founded 40 years ago, without any bickering.

So often the nurses are used as a political weapon by one party with which to beat the other. [Interruption.] That is the case. I represented the Conservative party when I spoke alongside the leader of the Labour party and the leader of the Liberal party at a nurses' rally in Central hall, Westminster, and I was pleased to do so. I said that I would fight to make my Government implement in full the pay review body's recommendation. The Government announced that they would do that and I expect them to live up to that assurance in full. Not only should they implement it in full, as they have agreed in principle to do, but if there is a shortfall because of the regrading due to an error in underestimating that, they should if necessary come forward with a supplementary estimate to ensure that the pay review body's recommendation can be implemented in full.

This is a vital subject. Despite the bickering and anger that occasionally flares across the Floor of the House, I feel instinctively that there is a growing consensus on how to tackle the problems of the NHS. I cannot speak for my hon. Friends. They fight their fight in their own way. I shall fight my fight in the House in the way that I have done ever since I came here 17 years ago.

I hope that the hon. Member for Peckham, perhaps in private moments with me, will accept that the private sector, of which she made no mention, is not generally in competition with the NHS, behind which I stand 100 per cent., but is more complementary to it. It works in co-operation with the NHS and it can make a growing contribution in filling some of the gaps that for a time will inevitably exist within the NHS.

I hope that the Government will continue to look sympathetically on the needs of a service that is close to the hearts of the overwhelming majority of the British people, and, perhaps, of all the political parties here. It is also probably close to the heart of 99 per cent., if not 100 per cent., of Conservative voters.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) made an independent speech and I hope that the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) listened carefully to what he said and the manner in which he said it.

The vote deals with expenditure in excess of £15 billion and I want some of that unimaginable sum for a highly important, much under-rated sector—the provision of fully trained speech therapists in our state schools for the benefit of youngsters suffering from speech defects. If those defects are not tackled, boys and girls at school will never realise their full potential. To say that in 1988 is to point to something that is desperately wrong.

Perhaps hon. Members will agree that youngsters are only young once and that the happiness of their families will be blighted if parents know that their children are not getting the expert attention or sufficient time to mitigate and/or eliminate their speech defects.

I want to quote from several letters that I have received from constituents on the matter. The first, from a Mrs. Davies, says:

"The school is a marvellous place and our son has achieved a great deal since going there over four years ago. The nursing sister whom we had absolute total confidence in is unfortunately retiring at the end of July 1988 and we have learnt to our horror she is to be replaced with a nurse who will only be on duty for 24 out of the 37½ hours at present, which means our child will be at school for several hours a week without a qualified nurse on duty to attend to any emergency which may arise."

She goes on to say:

"there are about 75 pupils at school. Over 50 of these pupils need regular speech therapy. We have one part-time speech therapist. The school needs two full-time speech therapists plus an assistant. We as parents are not asking for these things for ourselves but for our children. It is their right. They cannot go to ordinary schools."

My constituent ends:

"Please, please help us to get the nursing staff and speech therapists that our children are entitled to. Please, we beg you to help us in our campaign."

Another of my constituents, Mrs. Gerrard, writes:

"My husband and I are parents of a child who attends Dorin Park Special School in Chester. We are extremely concerned and worried to find that there is no full-time 'Speech Therapy' at the school."

That is a school, incidentally, that the parents praise highly. The letter continues:

"It is extremely vital that two full-time speech therapists, plus an assistant be employed at Dorin Park. As parents we cannot understand the reasons behind neglecting to employ someone, the education of the children being foremost. The children must come first and not the cutbacks. We would be extremely grateful for any help".

Mrs. Gerrard has a five-year-old child who suffers from severe cerebral palsy. I believe that the House would wish that such a fine school should have a full complement of speech therapists.

I repeat at this juncture that the budget for votes 1 to 5 exceeds £15 billion. On behalf of my constituents, and thousands of parents elsewhere in England and Wales, I claim a bigger share for speech therapy and physiotherapy.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): My hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) has raised the issue of speech therapy. I must tell him that I was rung by a speech therapist at 8.15 this morning who said that she had read in The Guardian that morning that the House would debate the estimates. She asked whether the pay award would be fully funded today and she asked me to ensure that the Minister addressed the issue of speech therapists' pay, because speech therapists had been struggling to get their pay award for many months. Whether it will be fully funded is another issue that they have been anxious to find out about. I am grateful that my hon. Friend has raised the matter and I hope that the Minister will make a reply that will give the speech therapists some hope that the pay award will be made and funded.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her apposite intervention. I am certain that the Minister will respond fully on this important matter.

I shall conclude my remarks on speech therapy by quoting briefly from a letter sent to me by Mrs. Dorothy Price, the chairman of the governing body of Ysgol Delyn, a special school. She says:

"The children have very specific needs which require the expertise of qualified therapists. The feeling is that if we don't have a statutory right to provide the necessary service surely we have a moral obligation."

She goes on to say:

"We are reneging on our responsibilities to these young people if we don't provide the service that has been shown to be needed."

First, I ask the Minister, in the knowledge that those matters are appropriately to be described as a moral issue, whether the Government will enable those youngsters to have a statutory right to that necessary service. Secondly, will the Government give extra cash to the authorities that must deliver speech therapy and physiotherapy services? Thirdly, have the families of deprived children the right to take that case and similar cases throughout England and Wales to the European Court? Fourthly, will the Government launch a campaign, under the auspices of the careers service, to promote careers in speech therapy and physiotherapy? Fifthly, will the Government give speech therapists and physiotherapists sufficient salary and status to attract applicants for training and for designated and advertised posts?

I note that £1·5 million was paid in 1987 to British Telecom in respect of the priority fault repairs service for general practitioners and pharmacists. I further note that for the current year £2 million is earmarked. That is extraordinary. Are the telephones of GPs and pharmacists so very faulty? I know that British Telecom is making a small fortune from repairing those faulty telephones—if it is repairing them—so why is priority repair hideously expensive? Does the Minister know how many telephones needed priority repair in 1987? We know that British Telecom's profits in 1987 were huge. Was its telephone service to GPs and pharmacists as unreliable and bad as the figures suggest? I look forward to receiving from the Minister a breakdown of the figures, which are to be found under the appropriate vote heading. If £2 million is earmarked for the repair of GPs' and pharmacists' telephones, there must be something very wrong indeed.

The social fund stands at £179 million and is for budgeting and crisis loans. It is also for community care grants, maternity expenses, funeral expenses and heating expenses in exceptionally cold weather. I do not think that the social fund is enough, and I would urge the Government to enlarge it.

I know from my work as an hon. Member who holds regular surgeries that the social fund is the last bastion of defence for the poverty-stricken and those who are destitute. One of my constituents came to me in distress, saying that he needed a new pair of shoes, and I said that I would try to help him. In the end, I am glad to say, the Department of Health and Social Security offered him £30. My constituent, who was under great pressure, had to repay that £30 loan which was described as a "budgeting loan".

My constituent desperately needed the pair of shoes but he did not feel that he could repay the loan at £3·50 a week. After all, he came to me because he was not managing on the weekly cash that he had. In the end, a kindly social fund officer rescheduled the budgeting loan at £1·41 a week. My constituent accepted that, but he is under immense pressure in finding that £1·41. He does not have a lot of money——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying a little outside the terms of the debate. We are discussing hospital community services and related services, whereas the hon. Gentleman is straying into the social services. I am sure that he will bring his remarks back to the subject under debate.

Mr. Jones: I am glad of your intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have brought me back into strict order, but I thought that while we were discussing the Supply estimates I could make the point on behalf of a desperate constituent.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on the question of nurses' pay. I have had deputations and much correspondence on the subject and the nurses in my part of the world tell me that, although a pay award of 15 per cent. has been trumpeted, many of them may receive only 4 to 5 per cent.

The hon. Member for Macclesfield made a strong and independent point about charges for dental examinations and eye tests, which we have debated in this place and on which we know the other place has a point of view. If the Government do not listen to the points made in another place and by the hon. Member for Macclesfield, the well-being of several million pensioners will be at risk. I urge the Government to listen carefully. If they do not, politically they will suffer greatly.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): As we all know, this debate takes place during the year of the 40th anniversary of the National Health Service. We all agree that in the 40 years for which the service has existed it has expanded enormously away from the concept of a tick-over service once outlined by Aneurin Bevan. It is now treating more patients, with more staff, in more hospitals, for more illnesses and disabilities, than ever before. What is more, it is receiving more Government finance than at any time in its history.

As has been said, the supplementary estimate will give our nurses the largest pay award that any Government have given the nursing profession. Opposition Members carp about the pay award as if it were the Government who had decided upon the award and the Government who were going to restrict it. Yet, as I am sure Opposition Members will have heard, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 14 July:

"£803 million was the figure estimated not by the Government but by the nurses' pay review body."—[Official Report, 14 July; Vol. 137, c. 547.]

They will also know that Mr. Trevor Clay said:

"There are many problems at local level. But some managements are succeeding in some districts. Why can't others make the same speed?"

I cannot criticise any Government who provide £803 million for the nursing profession. I hope that the grading problem will be sorted out as soon as possible. We must all recognise that it is a new dimension in nursing. We all know that it will produce difficulties and we should not imagine that they will be sorted out in a matter of three of four months. To hope for that would be unreasonably optimistic.

This supplementary estimate relating to the nurses' pay award has already produced much controversy in the Chamber. That suggests that, like the Supply estimate on which it is based, it is a source of controversy between the two sides of the House, as estimates have been in the history of the Health Service. We are all aware that Supply estimates and the inevitable supplementary estimates are merely guesstimates—no doubt informed guesstimates—by the Treasury and the DHSS. They are not estimates that are demand-led by the Health Service, the regions and the districts. They are figures chosen by Treasury officials to fit an extrapolation which may or may not be correct and which we seek to improve as the months of the financial year pass with supplementary estimate after supplementary estimate until we arrive at a figure that we think approximates to the resource needs of the NHS.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in South Glamorgan health authority, nurse is being set against nurse? Operating theatre nurses are being told that there are only a certain number of grade G posts, so some of them will have to go down to grade F, even though they have the same responsibilities as their colleagues on grade G

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: I do not want to get involved in grading. I am not an expert on it, nor have I had complaints about it from my district health authority. In fact, I have not had a single letter about it.

I want to pursue my point about the estimates. They are the only way by which the Health Service is funded. We pass them year after year and we have a right to expect that they should be more than informed guesstimates. They should have some bearing on the demands within the service. Those demands are the yardstick of the resources that need to be provided.

I am pressing my hon. Friend the Minister for a better way of funding the NHS than the system that has obtained in the past 40 years. These estimates, both supplementary and Supply, do not give me the basis for calculating how the global figures in them are reached. I do not know whether they assume additional savings within the Health Service, or a percentage increase in the number of patients to be treated and staff to look after them, and whether they take into account the effect of inflation on the equipment that hospitals will have to buy. I do not know what emphasis they place on savings in general health care. We all know that about £100 million has been saved by privatising certain services in the Health Service in the past nine years—mainly domestic and catering services. But what savings could be made by using the private sector of medicine to relieve demands on certain parts of the NHS for specialist treatment? Does the Department have a figure? If so, are those savings assumed in the estimate, let alone the supplementary estimate? Without such knowledge, statements about underfunding have little validity.

Yet underfunding was almost the keynote of the third report of the Select Committee on Social Services. The report, entitled "Resourcing the National Health Service: Prospects for 1988-89", gives two definitions of underfunding: first, it is "the amount of funding less than that required to maintain current service levels and planned development"; secondly, in a retrospective sense, it is

"the amount of funding required to maintain the service at a constant standing in relation to changes in demography, technology and policy aims."

Neither definition refers to further measures aimed at making existing funds go further with better management.

I admit that in paragraph 11 the Committee states that it accepts that the better use of resources can lead to higher performance but it goes on to say that that "does not of itself solve the continuing problem of underfunding."

That is such a definite statement that one must assume that the Committee is arguing that, with or without savings, the National Health Service is underfunded. I cannot help wondering whether the Committee has allowed itself to be persuaded by certain district and regional health authorities that such is the case.

I cast doubt on the Committee's conclusions because some health authorities appear to do rather better out of their budgets than others. As reported in The Times last week, some hospitals also seem to have a better record for treating patients than others. I recognise that, as the Committee pointed out, if budget savings or lower average costs mean treating more patients, that can lead to increased total costs. However, the obverse of that argument seems to be that the fewer patients treated, the lower the costs. That is clearly a self-defeating concept.

I am not arguing against more money for the NHS, but the old Parkinson rule—that expenditure tends to rise with income—still holds good, and I would be sorry if the Select Committee's comments were read as if they endorsed those who argue that the NHS is as efficient with its budget as it can be and that large additional sums for it are imperative to stave off further reductions in hospital services. It cannot be for nothing that the Trent and Birmingham health authorities have asked BUPA to provide them with a system for costing the services that they give. Probably I am not comparing like with like—I speak with a special interest in the matter—but I wonder why kidney dialysis units run by private health care companies for the NHS can provide dialysis that is 30 to 40 per cent. cheaper than the NHS dialysis units, and still make a profit. Carrying that argument to its natural conclusion, the present figure of 47 new kidney patients on dialysis per million could be almost doubled, which would put us right up alongside the top levels in western Europe. Will my hon. Friend explain, if she can, that wide diversity of charge?

Another area in which considerable sums of money could be saved and a better service provided is hospital laundry. By September 1987, privatisation of laundry work had saved £8·1 million, but considering that laundry and linen services cost the NHS £231 million a year, according to the National Audit Office report published in April 1987, one must wonder whether that is the best that we can do——

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: No, I shall not. Other hon. Members want to speak and the hon. Gentleman will have his chance.

A member of the laundry service in my constituency tells me that he believes, and it is the considered view of his trade, that savings of as much as £100 million are waiting to be made if private launderers are encouraged to tender for hospital contracts. Despite all the talk about privatising services since 1983, the amount of hospital laundry work, by value, being handled by the private sector has decreased. Yet I know from experience that the supply of sheets, pillow cases and blankets is often extremely haphazard in the National Health Service——

Mr. McCartney: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: —so much so that the service spends at least——

Mr. McCartney: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: No, I shall not give way. It is no good shouting at me.

The service spends at least £100 million on disposable linen substitutes, although I doubt whether anyone prefers them to ordinary linen. When I was a patient in one of the hospitals in Oxford, I was asked by the nursing staff to take up with the administrator the wretched supply of linen and blankets to the patients. I was asked to do that because, as a Member of Parliament, I was assumed to have some clout with the administrator. I am glad to say I did have some, because we did get a better supply—but what a miserable state of affairs.

I ask myself why the private sector is finding it so difficult to submit tenders for hospital laundry. I am told that the private sector, when asked to tender, is asked to tender in such a way as to make the chances of it wishing to proceed extremely improbable. I shall give three examples. When the Lewisham and north Southwark district health authority asked a private tenderer to submit a tender for its laundry service, it required a book containing 226 pages. The tender documents for the Peterborough hospital contained 186 pages and that for south-east Kent contained 238 pages. My constituent told me that one tender document was six books long and took him nearly four hours to read.

I shall quote a letter from a hospital laundry contractor who supplies hospitals all over western Europe. This is a letter that the contractor wrote to the district general manager of the Airedale health authority, giving his reasons for not tendering for the work. It said that the company

"is sorry to have to inform the Airedale Health Authority that it cannot submit a tender under the conditions to tender laid down by the Health Authority. This is in spite of investing hundreds of man hours and many thousands of pounds in the exercise to date."

The letter continues that the company

"has twenty years' experience of providing Full Rental Textile Care Services to hundreds of hospitals, clinics and old people's homes. It is part of a Group whose whole raison d'être is serving healthcare institutions. It cannot permit itself to enter into a contractual obligation which it believes to be neither commercially responsible and reasonable nor potentially a successful service to the customer."

That company told me that its standard contract is usually only five pages long, but the three examples I have given involve tender documents hundreds of pages long. One is forced to the conclusion that health authorities do not want to put their laundry service out to tender, whether savings can be made or not, and achieve that objective by asking for massive tender documentation. I remind the House that we are talking of little, simple things such as linen, blankets and towels. By imposing unreasonable contract terms, they do their best to dissuade private tenderers, despite the willingness of those same tenderers, to invest in the necessary equipment. They, or those responsible for running the laundries, prefer to have it in-house, perhaps because the wage structure relates to the number of pieces processed per week. Dare I say that hospital laundry managers have a vested interest in exaggerating the piece count? The private sector tell me that when they win a tender, the number of pieces processed falls by between 17 and 40 per cent., simply because payment is made on a different basis.

By the same token, is there any reason why the capital accounting procedures used in hospitals should favour in-house as opposed to external tenderers? In-house tenderers are allowed to discount their equipment purchases at the unrealistic figure of 5 per cent., and we all know what the standard price for money is in the market.

I have touched on three areas of National Health Service spending where the private sector can provide services that could mean major savings. Major savings mean getting more out of the resources that are available. If we are to move away from the idea that the National Health Service is chronically underfunded, we have to improve both the way in which we draw up our estimates and ensure that the resources available are used as wisely and prudently as possible.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): Although this has been a short debate, it has been interesting. I welcome the opportunity to take part as a Front Bencher in a debate on a report of the Social Services Select Committee, having for a number of years taken part in such debates as a member of that Select Committee when I was a Back Bencher.

It is a pity that the words of the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), were not listened to by more of his hon. Friends. When he got to his feet, I counted two of his Front Bench colleagues listening to him and five Back-Bench Members, which, of course, has been par for the course in recent health debates. When the Labour party spokesman got to her feet a little later the number went up to seven Back-Bench Members, but, of course, that included the Chairman of the Select Committee. I am afraid that it needs no more figures to demonstrate the real interest of the Labour party in issues to do with health care.

I shall answer briefly one or two of the points that have been made. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) asked for a statement on dental and eye charges. I do not know whether she heard it, but a statement was made earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and I have nothing to add to it.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) asked a number of questions, including questions about speech therapy and British Telecom. I hope that he will understand that, because of the short time available, I cannot answer his questions in detail, but I undertake to write to him.

We have had three splendid speeches from Conservative Members. I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson). I especially appreciated the excellent, robust speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North. I enjoyed the elegant and thoughtful remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, who might like to know that, on provisional estimates for renal dialysis, it looks as though the number of new patients per million is now up to about 50, so we have further progress there.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield will forgive me if I deal with his points in a moment.

As for the priority given to Health Service spending, the figures speak for themselves. This year alone the Government are spending some £23·5 billion on the NHS in the United Kingdom. Our spending will rise by nearly £2 billion over last year. That is a cash increase of some 9 per cent., or about 4·5 per cent. in real terms after allowing for general inflation. We have allocated a slightly higher proportion of our money to the regional health authorities in England this year, so the figures should be 9·5 per cent. in cash terms and 4·8 per cent. in real terms for the RHAs.

Mr. McCartney: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: Spending on the National Health Service this year will have risen by 39 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79. That compares with an increase in public spending as a whole of 16 per cent. in real terms over the same period. In other words, spending on the Health Service under this Government has risen two and a half times as fast as public spending in general. I am sure that the Chairman of the Select Committee will agree that this is the biggest budget that the National Health Service has ever seen.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North—who has left us—left us with the picture of Labour Members and, sadly, one or two Select Committee Members acting as bewildered children in a shop full of goodies, looking for the gaps on the shelves. My only concern is that his metaphor was a shop full of sweets—I would have preferred a shop full of fruit, but the point is well made.

Mr. McCartney: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: I should like to get a little further into my speech, because I want first to answer some of the points made by hon. Members who have been here the whole time.

Hospital and community health service spending on staff for all groups in the United Kingdom last year, including agency staff, was more than £11 billion. Of that, the estimated pay bill for our nurses and midwives was £5·2 billion; for doctors and dentists in the hospital and community health service it was £1·6 billion; and for the professions allied to medicine it was just over £500 million. We have accepted the estimates of the full cost of this year's review body awards which come to £803 million for nurses and midwives, £168 million for doctors and dentists, and £45 million for the professions allied to medicine. The £538 million sought in the summer supplementary estimates is the additional amount required on top of the 4·5 per cent. included in the public expenditure White Paper for England for the hospital and community health service. The hon. Member for Birkenhead is nodding. He is with me, even if no one else is. Other items are included in other supplementary estimates.

The difference between these estimates and those in the review body report is accounted for by employers' costs, that is national insurance and superannuation. The assessment of the hon. Member for Birkenhead of the historic size and importance of this supplementary estimate is far more accurate than the somewhat trite remarks of the hon. Member for Peckham.

We are employing more nurses than ever before. The last count last September showed a further increase to record levels. In England, there are 405,200 whole-time equivalent nurses and midwives—that is 490,000 on a head count. In itself that makes the regrading exercise so much more of a headache. It is a fact that more nurses in our employ are better qualified than ever before, including in the community nursing service where more than 80 per cent. of staff are qualified. I believe that that is all to the good.

It is a firm Government policy to improve nursing education through Project 2000 and to reduce the service burden of students so that they are no longer treated like skivvies. We feel just as strongly as the Royal College of Nursing about that and I believe that our stand has been courageous and welcome.

It is also a firm Government policy to look after nurses and midwives for their own sakes and because they are our core work force. In this country we rely very heavily on nurses and we have relatively fewer doctors compared with other countries. Our job and theirs is to look after the patients and we can do that only with a skilled, productive work force in a professional atmosphere with high morale whose contribution is recognised in the pay packet.

Mr. Galbraith: I am slightly worried that the Minister will not answer the very important question that we raised. If more money is required as a result of regrading than that already set aside by the Government, will they find the additional money to fund fully the regrading exercise?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman is aware that I think very highly of him. However, every time he rises I cannot help remembering that he came to this House after being a consultant in the National Health Service. He gave up £10,000 in salary to do so. We are certainly looking after someone very well out there. If he will bear with me, I hope to answer his question in full shortly.

We hope that the Opposition will not vote against the mammoth package of extra money for the nurses and midwives. I noted that the Labour party had a vote last night to which attention was drawn earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard). The national executive committee of the Labour party had to decide whether the Royal College of Nursing should be allowed anywhere near the Labour party conference. There was another split in the Labour party. There was a vote of 21:1 against the RCN going to the Labour party conference. The one was the Leader of the Opposition and the deputy leader was among the 21. I have checked up on this and I can state that the RCN is welcome at the Conservative party conference. I confirm that we expect to see the RCN at Brighton in October.

We have had plenty of humbug and hypothetical questions tonight. If the Labour party had won the 1979 general election there would not have been a nurses' pay review body or a supplementary estimate of the size that we are discussing. My concern about the Opposition's approach and that of the Select Committee on Social Services on occasion is that they are so negative. Every change is seen as a problem and every effort to cope with problems is seen as a failure, even when it is a blazing success. Every improvement is ignored and every opportunity to run down achievement is seized. The hon. Member for Birkenhead again described the pay awards as very generous. We are content to accept that compliment.

I want now to consider what is happening in Macclesfield. As my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield is aware——

Ms. Harman: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Lady has not given me enough time to answer all the questions that she asked. I will come to them in a moment. I hope that she will allow me first to pay a courtesy to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield who served on the Select Committee for Social Services with such distinction for so long.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield does not mind, I want to read a letter sent to me by Mr. Richard Jordan, who lives in Macclesfield. I imagine that he is a constituent of my hon. Friend. I checked with Mr. Jordan and he said that he would be delighted if I were to read out his letter. His handwriting is a little shaky and hon. Members will understand why in a moment. He wrote:

"Dear Mrs. Currie,

I am fed up with hearing the complaints about the NHS, of course everybody wants more money, but please tell us all how wonderful the service is, the Macclesfield General and West Park Hospitals have brought me through two heart attacks and now two strokes, hence my bad writing.

All the staff at our hospitals are marvellous and I hope you will praise them. Doctors in our village on the spot at home within minutes, ambulance, doctors, nurses, equipment is here within the half hour, immediate doctor and nurses attention on arrival at hospital, food very good, with varied menus, sisters and nurses nothing too much trouble.

When I had my strokes the doctor and even the specialist from the hospital called at home to confirm my condition and examine me. My local doctor saw to the nurses, physiotherapy, calling and providing me with a wheelchair, stick, chair, and everything including oxygen etc. I felt that the NHS has done so much . . . We are so grateful to the NHS and feel sure there are many more people who feel the same way."

He comments further about the cheerful and expert service. That is the service in Macclesfield, and it is repeated throughout the country.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead asked one or two specific points. I will consider those and then consider the regrading exercise in some detail.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: As my hon. Friend the Minister has referred specifically to my constituency, I want to confirm everything in Mr. Jordan's letter. I have splendid doctors, wonderful nurses and, as my hon. Friend the Minister knows, a new district general hospital. However, with regard to my local hospital, perhaps she will refer to the fact that its new operating theatres are closed for several sessions a week when they could be relieving people who require hip replacement or knee joint replacement operations. They are closed because there are inadequate resources to staff the hospital and theatres to operate 100 per cent. of the time. We have growing waiting lists in important specialties. I fully accept that we have an excellent hospital and that it provides fine service, but perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister should direct her attention to the point that I have raised.

Mrs. Currie: As my hon. Friend is aware, part of the difficulty in some of the theatres, as has been shown in recent research studies, has arisen in obtaining the key staff, especially the nurses, to work in them. That is why we are undertaking a clinical grading review so that highly qualified staff who accept a lot of responsibility should be paid appropriately. We are certain that that will help to alleviate the problems in future.

Mrs. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood). It is a little late.

Mrs. Currie: If it is a matter of being a little late perhaps the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) will stay here a little longer and hear what I have to say.

Ms. Short: I am here for the next debate.

Mrs. Currie: Right.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead asked about Medical Defence Society subscriptions. As he is aware, the doctors' and dentists' review body recommended that two thirds of the costs of subscriptions should be reimbursed directly. As the hon. Gentleman will realise, the cost to the health authorities can be estimated quite precisely and they have been included.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead also asked about Whitley. As he is probably aware, the settlements are coming in fairly close to the figures that we anticipated. Others are not yet settled, and we do not normally speculate while pay negotiations are still under way, for obvious reasons. I hope that the hon. Member for Birkenhead will be satisfied with that reply.

Let us consider the regrading exercise. I suspect that there has been some misunderstanding and I want to assist the House. First, it does not apply to all nursing staff. Managers and students are excluded by agreement. About 85 per cent. of our nursing staff are affected, but that means that we are talking about a large proportion of the half a million nurses that we employ. The nurse managers are the subject of a separate grading exercise. Students will be affected by Project 2000. However, under the 1988 review body awards, the minimum for senior nurses will be 5 per cent. The minimum for students will be 6·3 per cent. and the minimum pay rise for all the nurses will be 4·2 per cent.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead asked several questions about how the pay bill was divided and calculated.

Ms. Harman: We know all that.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Member for Birkenhead asked some questions and I am answering them. He obviously did not know the answers.

The Government set up a sample survey of staff and asked them of what their work consisted. We tried to work out, by grossing up, how many staff will be involved in changing grade. We gave the figures to the review body along with our considered views on the increase in pay needed for other reasons such as inflation or the extra costs of living in London. We accepted what the review body said about the costs of the exercise to the National Health Service. I shall remind the House of precisely what Sir James Cleminson said in the review body's report. In paragraph 154 he says:

"Our estimates are necessarily approximate because they are themselves based on estimates."

We provide estimates of manpower levels and pay bills every year. That is how the DHSS cash was calculated, and we accepted the figures in good faith. If the hon. Member for Birkenhead thinks about it, he will agree that the method that I have described is easily the obvious method of calculation. Had he recommended it, I would have said that it was an intelligent and serious approach to a fiendishly difficult problem.

With the exception of funds for the London supplement, the total sum allocated to regional health authorities was in proportion to their initial cash limits. This tried and tested method has been used in previous years. We considered doing it differently; other methods have their advantages and disadvantages.

Hon. Members asked whether we are satisfied that the estimates are accurate and whether we will implement the exercise in the spirit in which it was intended. Of course the answer is yes. When such large numbers of staff are to be regraded there are a limited numbers of ways for a Government to respond. They can offer the figures and accept the calculations in good faith—which we did; that meant requesting a set amount of cash as a supplementary estimate—they can reject all the calculations and use guesswork, which we were not prepared to do, or they can say "Go ahead, never mind the cost." But that implies offering a blank cheque. I accept the strictures of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield that that would have been irresponsible. We have issued much guidance, which is all in the Library. I sometimes wonder why we put it in the Library, because I do not think that anybody reads it.

I shall set out precisely for what the money for which we are voting is intended. I shall set out in public the views that we discussed in private with regional health authorities. The money is to regrade jobs as they were in post on 1 April this year. We accept that that is a snapshot, but there must be a set date or it is not fair. The money is not for new posts or to fill vacancies as at 1 April. That would be growth, which has already been argued for. Some 1·2 per cent. is provided for RAWP and 1·5 per cent. for cost-improvement and income-generating programmes. There has already been more than 2·5 per cent. growth this year.

The money can be used to replace agency staff. It is not intended to permit health authorities to bow to trade unions or industrial relations pressures. The entire review body system for nurses, midwives and professions allied to medicine was set up precisely because those professions had put their patients first despite industrial action by others. In a press release last week, the Royal College of Nursing told us to get on with it. It said that it was confident that the Government would keep their promises and that the sooner the exercise was finished the better.

The money is not for health authorities to think up their own gradings. This is not a local version of regional pay. We have put our views about regional pay to the review bodies, but that is a completely separate issue. It is essential to have consistency of grading across the country so that the same grade does the same work. Our officials will be visiting health authorities during the summer to ensure that this consistency is achieved. That is only fair and it is what we have agreed with the staff.

The hon. Member for Peckham bleated on about the sufficiency or otherwise of the enormous sum on which we shall be voting. We have received no firm information and we shall not act on rumour, especially rumour put about by one or two trade unions that might want to bid-up gradings, to try to poach members or alarm good staff.

It is early days and there is a long way to go. We are unlikely to have any solid information before the autumn —much closer to the deadline of 31 October. Any other views are pure speculation, and many of them are plain wrong.

I shall write to the hon. Member for Birkenhead in more detail about the issues that he raised, but I should like to put the regrading exercise in context. It is the biggest change to face nursing for many years. It is the biggest personnel activity since the National Health Service was established. It is probably the biggest review this decade of health care staff in Europe. It is certainly far bigger than anything we have handled before and it affects far more staff, every single one of whom is personally assessed and regraded. It is a heck of a lot bigger than regrading the staff in the citizens advice bureau in Birkenhead and it is light years away from the proverbial whelk stall which, on the admission of Opposition Front Bench spokesmen, Opposition Members could not run.

It is worth remembering the regrading exercise in the Halsbury report, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Birkenhead. I have read the report, which says:

"Within the time limits which we set ourselves to submit our report we have not been able to carry out evaluation in depth of the work of each grade . . . what we have seen and heard has left us in no doubt that an evaluation of this kind is urgently needed."

That was November 1974. We are undertaking the exercise because we have the management skills and the resources. I hope that the House will honour and recognise our commitment.

Mr. Frank Field: There seems to be some question about when the debate should finish. Before I make my brief concluding comments, will you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, say whether I am right in thinking that this debate can run for three hours?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By a resolution of the House of 22 June, this debate can last three hours. If the House wishes, the debate may continue until 8.23 pm. I understand that some arrangement may have been made to finish the debate earlier so that the second debate can begin. The resolution of the House is clear.

Mr. McCartney: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for raising a point of order at this stage, and I understand what you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, said about formal arrangements being made. In her opening remarks, the Minister criticised Labour Members for not being available to debate the Health Service. She did so in the knowledge that her office refused my request for a meeting to discuss underfunding in my constituency. An apology was given on the basis——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a point that would be perfectly legitimate in a debate, if he were called.

Mr. Field: You kindly informed the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that an informal agreement has been made. When these agreements are made, the experts in the usual channels should talk to the people——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I made clear the resolution of the House, by which I am bound. I added in parenthesis that I thought some informal agreement had been reached. It is my job to carry out the resolution of the House. I hope that is clear to hon. Members.

Mr. Field: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for saying that and I hope that hon. Members have heard your remarks. My hon. Friends and some Conservative Members have been present for all the debate. My hon. Friends do not now wish to take part, so I can therefore bring the debate to a conclusion.

I think that the Whips have an important lesson to learn from tonight's proceedings. I hope that it will be learnt by Labour and Government Whips. It is not pleasant for hon. Members who have been present throughout the debate—who have much expertise and who wished to contribute to the debate—to be leaned on so that some informal agreement can be adhered to. That is a sour note for me to begin my summing up on, but perhaps it is appropriate, given the comments made by the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security.

[Mr. Field]

I have merely two things to say. Many hon. Members made efforts to divide what I said from the sentiments that were expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman). Perhaps my hon. Friend made her points more gently than I did, but there was certainly no disagreement between us. It was strange for the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) to have to make his point. Apart from the hon. Members for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) and for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), who did not think that it was necessary to discuss the estimates, there was no disagreement at all.

Opposition Members are concerned about one central issue, which I put to the Under-Secretary of State. I hope that she heard the message, if not from Opposition Members, from practically every Conservative Member who has spoken in the debate. They are as pleased as we are about the size of the supplementary estimate. They and Opposition Members are pleased that, officially and unofficially, we welcome the Government's commitment fully to fund the pay award. We have raised a single crucial question. Is the regrading exercise to be screwed up because of a cash ceiling, or will the Government give the green light so that the regrading exercise can take place and fulfil the review's expectations that the Prime Minister outlined?

Being the written word, Hansard does not take account of the way in which hon. Members shake their heads. It is important for us to recall that, when I asked whether the exercise is to be cash-limited, the Under-Secretary of State said no. She shook her head like one of those dogs that sit in the back of cars. When the cars stop, their heads move. It was a terribly important intervention from her.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman should beware of reading anything into my gesture when, at one stage, I talked to the Whip, who was sitting on one side, and to my Secretary of State, who was sitting on the other side. I apologise if I made my point in a rushed way, but I am conscious that a large number of hon. Members are waiting to speak in the next debate, and we must be courteous to them also. We did the calculations in good faith. We accepted the recommendations of the review body in good faith and in good heart. We are voting today on the biggest supplementary estimate that the Health Service has ever seen. The regrading exercise is being done in detail for 500,000 people.

We have no hard information and no information that will confirm any of the rumours or negative comments that are being put about. We already have some information that we may well have got it right. I hope, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman also hopes, that all the experience that is going into the matter will bear fruit and that the net result will be some contented nurses and well-cared-for patients.

Mr. Field: From the Under-Secretary of State's careful statement I hope that we may infer that, when we return after the summer recess, we may seek more time to consider a further supplementary estimate so that we can make a reality of the Government's commitment fully to fund the nurses' pay award.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman, who is Chairman of the Select Committee, agree that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State herself admitted that the pay review body stated that this is its best estimate? Therefore, there could clearly be an error. Should we not be able to accept from that, if indeed there is an error after a responsible clinical regrading is carried out, that the Government should have the courage and decency to come forward with another supplementary estimate?

Mr. Field: As usual, I could not have phrased the point better than the hon. Member for Macclesfield has. I hope that that message has clearly gone to the Government.

Mr. McCartney: As Chairman of the Select Committee, will my hon. Friend ask the Under-Secretary of State to reconsider the matter and agree to meet me and discuss the basic point relating to the underfunding of my health authority?

Mrs. Currie rose

Mr. Field: I shall not give way to the Under-Secretary of State. As my hon. Friend spoke, she was beckoning with her first finger. I hope that, when the regrading exercise is completed, the Under-Secretary of State is as happy to give signs to all the nursing profession as she is to give them to my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney).

We have an informal agreement to which the Select Committee was not a party. We have used four minutes of the time allowed for debate on the next topic, and I apologise for that. If the Whips want informal agreements, they should talk to the right people, and, in this case, it is Select Committees.

Original question deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates).

TRAINING COMMISSION

Adult Employment and Youth Training

[Relevant document: First Report from the Employment Committee (House of Commons Paper No. 526 of Session 1987-88) on the Department of Employment's Estimates 1988-89.]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £281,927,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31 March 1989 for expenditure by the Department of Employment on a grant in aid to the Training Commission (formerly the Manpower Services Commission).—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I remind the House that, under the resolution of the House of 22 June, this estimate is to be considered in so far as it relates to adult employment and youth training.

7.45 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I am pleased to be able to introduce this debate, which gives the House an opportunity to consider and discuss employment training.

The Committee took evidence from the Training Commission, the Minister, and the permanent secretary at the Department of Employment. We published that evidence, and I hope that it will illuminate matters and inform the House. As yet, the Committee has not come to a common view on the merits of the new programme. I emphasise that the views that I shall express in opening the debate are my own and that other hon. Members will speak for themselves.

I fear that, compared with our competitors, training is something that we as a nation do not do terribly well or excel in. In the first half of this century, our survival was often held to depend on military capacity. But from now on it will depend as much or more on the efficiency and effectiveness of our industry, research and development, and investment in the skills of our people. When we compare ourselves with our competitors, there can be no room for complacency.

In the last Parliament, the Committee could not have been other than impressed to see young Japanese people going to school until aged 20, leaving with a thorough grounding in mathematics and science, and then joining the great Japanese companies and receiving a further year's training in the speciality of the company involved. Plainly, such enterprises benefit from a highly competent work force. Today, it is a matter not of just getting state of the art, modern, high-tech equipment, but of having a highly skilled work force to exploit and get the best out of.

Because of time restraints, I shall briefly mention only one other country. A fortnight ago, the Committee spent a couple of days in the Federal Republic of Germany. One had to recognise the thorough, comprehensive training that is given to the whole of the younger generation there. Of the 16 to 18 year group, 20 per cent. were in grammar schools preparing for university, 20 per cent. were in full-time vocational schools, and 56 per cent. were in the renowned dual system of apprenticeships. The average annual cost of an apprenticeship place was £8,000—incidentally, all paid for by employers, who seem to be as convinced of the value of investing in skills of their people as that of investing in their machines. We visited a railway workshop called Duewag making rolling stock. Many apprenticeship places there cost £10,000. But the proof of the pudding is in the eating. That firm has a buoyant, flourishing export trade. Coming from Britain—the country that invented railways and once built them all over the world but is now closing its railway workshops and will soon be importing rolling stock—it was an eerie experience to be shown a video of that firm's rolling stock being sold in many countries on every continent of the world. Obviously, training is a vital ingredient of success.

I refer directly to the estimates and, in particular, last year's estimate for the new job training scheme. We discovered that the initial sum that was allowed for the JTS was £215 million. Because of poor take-up, that sum was cut to £156 million, but, eventually, only £64 million was actually spent—in other words, just 42 per cent. of the reduced figure. There was a massive underspend. We must recognise that the programme was wildly unsuccessful. It was hugely unpopular, with an extremely large number of drop-outs. There were resources for 232,000 entrants. Over 100,000 people entered the programme, but, by the end of the year, only about 30,000 were in place, so the Training Commission agreed that the programme had failed.

As there are several similarities between the JTS and the new employment training scheme, we asked the Training Commission what lessons it had learned from the experience. The Training Commission suggested four things: first, to start with realistic, not over-ambitious targets; secondly, to give sufficient financial incentives, both to trainees and managing agents; thirdly, to sell the scheme better to employers, some of whom were hesitant to take on the long-term unemployed; and fourthly, to gain the co-operation of all the parties involved on whom it is dependent for the delivery of the programme: employers, local authorities, voluntary associations and trade unions. We were told that these are the lessons that need to be incorporated into the new programme.

Before looking at how successfully the lessons might have been learned, may I say that in none of the countries that we have visited has training or training programmes been a cause of acute political controversy between the parties. The approach to these matters has been agreed by all those principally concerned.

In those countries, there is thus a consensus approach, and everyone gets on with the job. Indeed, on a visit to the DGB, the German TUC, I specifically asked whether there were any differences between the parties on training, and was answered with a categoric no.

Only in Britain have these matters been rent by acrimony. Why? The answer is partly the inadequate nature of programmes, and the motives for introducing them. We have had YOPS, TOPS, CP, JTS, and much else—all schemes which, in their time, we were told to be proud of, yet now all scrapped. Therefore, it is not perhaps surprising that there is some cynicism. Few of those schemes were meant to be permanent; they were conceived as temporary palliatives to ameliorate the effects of unemployment.

In answer to question 121 in his evidence to the Committee, the Minister of State, whom I am pleased to see in his place, said of the community programme:

> "You will know that the Community Programme originally was—if I can put it this way without being too crude—to fill in the time of the unemployed in ways useful to the community. That was the idea behind it."

The schemes were specifically designed to have a "register effect", in other words, to reduce the unemployment count. I fear the Government's motives were suspected. Many people saw the schemes as a cheap way of massaging the unemployment figures for electoral reasons.

What the country needs is not temporary expedients, not cosmetic palliatives, but high quality, credible, training programmes, ideally aiming to give us a work force as well trained or better trained than any in the world. That needs agreement, and the active co-operation of all parties concerned. It means a national consensus as to what is required. To obtain a consensus people have to listen to each other, and that includes the Government. It is no good the Government saying that they have a huge majority, therefore they can do what they like, because that way leads to disaster. It means, for instance, the Government listening to the trade unions. That is not something that the Goverment have been very good at. They have preferred to regard the unions as the enemy within, to be undermined and eliminated. That is not the way to reach agreement or consensus. The trade unions must be valued as essential partners.

I turn now to the new employment training programme. It does not, of course, address the training needs of the 90 per cent. of those in employment. That is another story for another time. It is a programme for the long-term unemployed—and it is targeted on two groups: the 18 to 24-year-olds who have been unemployed for six months, and the 18 to 50-year-olds who have been unemployed for more than two years.

[Mr. Ron Leighton]

I fully support the concept of a programme for the long-term unemployed. As a result of the seven-year recession that we suffered after 1979, we have between one and two million people who have been unemployed for years. Unless something is done specifically for them many will never work again. Unemployment is not an orderly queue, where those waiting longest are first off. The reverse is the case.

The programme is not, of course, an exercise in job creation. To succeed it should ensure that the long-term unemployed get a fairer share of the jobs which are available. The Committee has paid great attention to the long-term unemployed and in the previous Parliament we produced a report advocating a job guarantee for the long-term unemployed. I do not know whether Ministers have seen that report, but they might care to read it at some point.

The most useful thing that I can do this evening is to turn to the question marks over the new programme. The first is the level of funding and the quality of training. The numbers of people to be put through the programme annually are scheduled to increase from the 400,000 who were on the old programmes to 600,000 on the new programme—an increase of 50 per cent. but with no new money. How is it possible to increase the numbers by 50 per cent. and at the same time to enhance the quality of the training without any more money? The participants will spend only 40 per cent. of their time on directed training, in other words, two days per week for about six months. Perhaps we could hear what vocational qualifications that will achieve.

Let me come back to the lessons learned from the new job training scheme. The first is the need for adequate financial incentives. The Government are great believers in financial incentives. The last Budget was predicated on the need to give already wealthy people thousands of pounds of incentives to get them to work. So what are the financial incentives to come on the programme? The fact is that most of the participants on the present community programme will be worse off on the new employment training programme.

Many of the participants on the community programme are young single men. The pay is an average of £67 a week for a part-time place. In a letter dated 2 July, the Minister of State told us that a single person aged 22, with travel costs of £8 per week, would receive a net income of £33 per week—that is for doing three days' work or work experience. Like such single people, many others will be more than £20 per week or as in that case £30 per week worse off. Presumably that is the way in which more people are put on the programme for the same amount of money.

The new employment training programme moves away from the idea of some sort of rate for the job for the work part of the programme to benefit plus. That, not surprisingly, is controversial. Some people see it as a move to workfare, the approach which was discredited in some states in the United States of America. The plus is some £10 above benefit. Out of that, the first £5 of travel expenses must be paid, reducing it to some £5 per week. Being out of the house and being on the programme will inevitably involve extra expenses, such as buying food, so people could be worse off financially.

On 24 May, the Secretary of State, who I am pleased to see in his place, stated:

"we are aiming to ensure a position in which no one is worse off when taking part in the programme than they would be on benefit."—[Official Report, 24 May 1988; Vol. 134, c. 281.]

Well, yes, but should there not be an incentive that makes them better off? My modest suggestion when the scheme was first announced was that the plus above benefit should be doubled, because that would be something of an incentive. To do so would cost £180 million per annum. We are told that the Treasury is currently awash with revenue, so it cannot say that it has not got the money. I should like to reiterate that suggestion this evening—

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent) rose——

Mr. Leighton: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman who is an extremely valuable member of the Committee. However, the intervention may take time from the time available for him to make the speech which I hope to hear later.

Mr. Rowe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. If, as he began by saying, training is indispensable to people's future employment, should they not value it a great deal more than enforced idleness? Therefore, should they not see the benefit of a training programme as being of considerable advantage to themselves?

Mr. Leighton: Yes. That is precisely what was said about JTS, but it failed. When we asked the Training Commission why, it gave us four reasons and one of the things it suggested was that a financial incentive should be offered. Some may argue that there should be no such incentive and that people should value the training and do it for nothing, but the Training Commission considered that a financial incentive was important.

The other major lesson that the Training Commission drew from the failure of the JTS was the need to secure the support and co-operation of all the other parties involved and on whom the Training Commission is dependent for the delivery of its programme.

The other parties involved in the programme are the employers, the local authorities, voluntary organisations and trade unions. The Secretary of State knows that he faces some problems in that regard and that the conditional support of the TUC is less than full-hearted. The vote in the general council was extremely close and it will be a contentious matter at the congress in September. Britain's largest white collar union, the National and Local Government Officers Association, and Britain's largest unions, the Transport and General Workers Union and the National Union of Public Employees, are actively opposed to the programme.

Trade unionists have expressed a number of concerns about the programme, which include the low level of allowance and the perception that employers will get workers for £5 a day, thus exerting a downward pressure on wages. They are concerned that trade unions had to be consulted about the proposed schemes for the community programme, but that trade union approval is no longer necessary for the employment training programme. The principle of parity on the Training Commission has been broken—six extra employers' representatives have been placed on the commission to outnumber trade union representatives. I do not understand why, but we may receive an explanation tonight.

The most important worry for some unions is whether the programme is voluntary—for the critics of the programme that is the key issue. At present, the programme is not compulsory, perhaps for no other reason than that there are not nearly enough places for the client group. The Secretary of State has said may times that the programme is voluntary and that he has no plans or intent to make it compulsory. Nevertheless, many people have the strong fear that, if the unemployed vote with their feet, as they did with the JTS, they will be pressured into the scheme or lose benefit.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): rose——

Mr. Leighton: I am just about to quote my hon. Friend, but I hope that she will forgive me if I do not give way.

The Secretary of State has been asked many times, as he was on 24 May by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), to state that he will not designate the scheme under section 26 of the Employment Act 1988 during the lifetime of this Parliament. I hope that I have anticipated the point that my hon. Friend was seeking to make. However, each time the Secretary of State has declined to say that he will not designate the scheme. If he did not designate the scheme that, more than any other step, would defuse opposition to the programme. If the Secretary of State really does not intend to designate and thus make the scheme compulsory, I cannot understand why he will not make that simple categoric statement. So much depends on it.

The Secretary of State is aware that many voluntary organisations that have participated in the community programme have written to hon. Members to express their worries—one of the main ones is the lack of funding to continue project training.

The Under-Secretary will know of an organisation called Mutual Aid, which he has visited. It sent me a document that showed a nice picture of him visiting that organisation and described the kind things he said about it. He might care to know that Mutual Aid has written to me because it is worried about the new programme and it voices its criticisms of it.

The Secretary of State knows that many local authorities, including many Conservative-controlled authorities, are declining to participate. The Minister of State wrote us a letter to inform us that Kensington and Chelsea will not participate, apparently because they believe they will be out of pocket.

I believe that a number of improvements will be necessary to obtain the support of the partners, who are necessary to deliver the programme. I welcome the £50 allowance for child care for single parents. I hope that that will prove to be the thin edge of a desirable wedge to develop child care in this country. The Secretary of State might care to have a word with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer about removing the existing tax disincentives for workplace nurseries and creche facilities. It will also be necessary to ensure that single parents coming off the employment training programme obtain jobs with sufficient pay to enable them to continue to finance such child care.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West) rose——

Mr. Leighton: My hon. Friend will have a chance to make his point in his speech and I am not anxious to prolong my remarks.

A programme directed at the long-term unemployed is vital. I am sure that, after the recess, the Select Committee on Employment will want to pay great attention to ascrutinising and monitoring the programme. I believe that what we have presently is half a loaf and I shall devote my time to seeking to obtain some improvements so that we get the whole loaf.

8.5 pm

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): As time is short and as many colleagues on both sides of the House wish to speak, I shall be brief.

The debate must be put in a wider historical context. Last summer I read an extremely important work on Britain's industrial decline during this century by Correlli Barnett entitled "The Audit of War". That describes the collapse of our competitive industrial position vis-à-vis the other developing European countries from the post-industrial revolution era until now. It highlights a number of the essential ingredients that have contributed to that decline and the key ingredient was our attitude to acquiring skills compared to the attitude in other countries. At the higher level of skill training for management and at the basic level of skill training of the work force we have progressively, over many decades, lost out to our competitors. The Select Committee report has highlighted the effect of chickens coming home to roost after a long time.

In today's edition of the Evening Standard there is an interesting article that highlights the problem to which the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) referred and the problem we face with schemes such as the community programme. The article is entitled "Thousands can't read after 11 years at skool".

That article states:

"Alarming disclosures are made today about school-leavers who can't read, write or do simple sums . . . after 11 years in the classroom.

Thousands of teenagers leave school without these vital skills and six out of ten are so frustrated in fifth forms of comprehensives that they play truant either part or all of the time.

Dr. Tom Wood, head of a youth training centre, says:

"We have to give basic literacy and numeracy skills to the young people who have for some reason reached 16-plus with limited proficiency in these areas' . . . When teenagers are urged to take part in any training involving the three Rs . . . they usually pretend to be sick to avoid being humiliated . . . One in three of the teenagers questioned at training schemes said they had not been interested in passing exams at school because they thought this would not help them get work."

I know that every hon. Member in the Chamber has visited, as I have on a number of occasions, youth training schemes in their constituencies and in other parts of the country. They will be only too aware of the fact that, in many cases, they cater for the drop-outs from schools—the people to whom the article referred. The most interesting thing that one discovers is that, when training is put in the right context and the trainees can see a skill coming into their hands which they will find relevant to their futures, they are remotivated to learn. Perhaps one of the most important pressures behind the Education Reform Bill, which attempts to deal with the literacy problem in schools, was to address the difficulty of children who are demotivated during the latter years at school. The schemes that we are debating relate to adult and youth training which is designed to help people who have left school recently or some time ago.

[Mr. Spencer Batiste]

This debate, which I suspect will become increasingly significant in the years ahead, takes place against the background of the changing nature of the labour market. In many parts of the country, employers are saying over and over again that they simply cannot recruit people to fill vacancies because people do not have the necessary skills. Only today, I had a letter from Leeds city council, which is typical of many of the stories told to Members of Parliament. It states:

"The Council has a nursery building programme closely monitored by the Nursery Committee. The Committee's objective is to spend budgets allocated with the minimum of 'slippage' and achieve set building 'targets'.

One problem experienced in the last few months has been the difficulty in recruiting skilled builders, particularly bricklayers.

One contractor has a contract to build 3 nurseries of a total value of £4½ million and this Contractor . . . has had repeated difficulty recruiting bricklayers to the extent that the contract is now several weeks behind schedule.

The Committee has pursued this matter through its own Education Department and it is hoped that 'Employment Training' and 'Training for Skills' courses could help the situation."

Until recently, in many parts of the country, people were not motivated to take skills training because they could not see any jobs available for them when they had acquired those skills. However, as a consequence of the 23-month record period during which unemployment has plummeted in all parts of the country, that situation is now quite different. We can now say to youngsters, "The problem is that you lack the skills that employers need. This programme is designed to help you obtain those skills."

The old scheme had its shortcomings. The hon. Member for Newham, North-East described some of the shortcomings of the new JTS. Those were highlighted in the Select Committee report which is a most valuable document. It stated that only 110,000 people were in training in September 1987 when the resources of the scheme catered for 232,000. The hon. Gentleman described that as a failure. I am not sure whether one should look at the glass and describe it as half full or as half empty. That depends, I suspect, whether one is on the Conservative or Opposition Benches. Clearly, 110,000 people benefited from that scheme, although at least as many again could have done so. Basically, the scheme was about right, but there were a number of factors in it which did not enable it to develop its full potential.

Mr. Leighton: At the end of the year, there were only 30,000 people in training.

Mr. Batiste: I noted that point. That led to my right hon. Friend asking the Manpower Services Commission, as it then was, to review the scheme to see whether it could be made more attractive. It has done that with a view to providing a scheme that will offer literacy and numeracy training at the lowest level and go right through to the high-tech training that is also needed. It is important to note that the scheme was approved by all the commissioners, including the three trade union commissioners, in the MSC.

The scheme is fair and, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-East has conceded, the lessons of the new JTS have been learned, although he argues that the financial incentives should be increased further. I would take rather a different line. If the scheme is to be successful, the greatest incentive must be that those taking part in the scheme see that the skills that they acquire will lead them to a job. Otherwise, we shall run into the danger that it will become an infill operation. The real incentive, if the scheme is to be successful, is that those who participate will acquire something that will be valuable to them in the long term so that they will have an exploitable resource to offer the labour market in years to come.

This scheme is only part of the picture. Training is vital across the spectrum. I should not like anyone to think that, because the Government are putting such a great deal of money into the scheme, that absolves everyone else from responsibility for training. Everyone has a fundamental responsibility for training. That starts in the schools and continues in the colleges, polytechnics and universities. It also lies with local authorities and employers. I am also delighted to see that some of the more enlightened trade unions, such as that of the electricians, are undertaking significant and valuable training schemes of their own. The identification of training as one of the high priorities by some in the modern trade union movement is a welcome sign.

Skill training is about how we tackle the problem of unemployment and how we meet the industrial needs of our society. There is a need for motivation. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are preoccupied with that. The difficulty with a scheme of this kind is that people who should know better pump negative publicity at it. Even if, in the words of the hon. Member for Newham, North-East, they would prefer to see a whole loaf rather than half a loaf, they should not condemn it. Those people should encourage its development. It is a disgrace that the TGWU, NALGO, NUPE and COHSE should oppose the scheme.

Ms. Short: It is a disgrace that the Government are putting forward such a rotten scheme.

Mr. Batiste: Opposition Members are taking a negative attitude towards the scheme.

Undoubtedly, young people will look to the scheme as a way to make up for the opportunities that they have missed in the education system as a result of a series of problems inherent in the structure of our society that we are trying to tackle at all levels. People outside the House will see Opposition Members and those in the union movement who oppose the scheme as using that group of people and exploiting them for political ends.

The scheme is a good one. It meets important needs in our society and everyone who is concerned about skill training should do everything in his power to ensure that it succeeds.

8.18 pm

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): In the short time available to me, I should like to concentrate on those aspects of the new training programme which have caused great concern to those organisations involved with the programme. I want to concentrate on the voluntary organisations that are involved.

To set the tone, I should like to quote from the Church of Scotland's Church and Nation deliverance at the 1988 General Assembly, which the Prime Minister attended. It states that it views

"with great concern the Government's plan to end the Community Programme, under which many thousands of jobs involved with care and support in the community have been created, which jobs will, in general, be lost in September when the programme comes to an end."

It also views with concern.

"the morality of the Government's new Employment Training Scheme believing that the proposals militate against natural justice. (For many years Job Creation has provided union approved wages related to the work done; the proposals depart from this by paying a negligible bonus in addition to the existing state benefit.); and instruct the Church and Nation Committee to communicate with the relevant Government Departments, with a view to having the provisions of the scheme considered."

The Minister will perhaps tell us how he has replied to the deliverance, to which his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister no doubt listened with great concern. I questioned the Minister when he was before the Select Committee on Employment about the attitudes of voluntary organisations. He suggested, not dismissively but curtly, that the bids for places were over-subscribed. That included many bids from voluntary organisations. I then asked the local organisations whether they agreed with the Minister's views. The Dundee association of social services said that there was no evidence of any local discussions initiated by the Training Commission with that organisation, which brings together all the voluntary sector organisations in Dundee. As far as it was concerned it was hardly voluntary, given that after September there was no alternative. Obviously, given the very good work that they do the organisations might well be opened to opting out. In many cases, they were not prepared to sacrifice their organisations without some commitment from the Government to ensure that the organisations would not suffer because they had participated in the scheme.

The Tayside committee on alcohol abuse was very concerned that after September there would be a closure, or certainly a curtailment, of some of its activities. Its service was a giving service and it certainly could not cope with training and managing a particular scheme. It was concerned that the Wishart centre in Dundee might have to close its day centre because its capabilities would be reduced. It could lead to alcoholism research being discontinued and affect the benefits to other organisations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion), who unfortunately is unable to be here tonight, received a letter from the Wishart centre. He had written to the Under-Secretary of State for Employment. I should like to put on record the response to the letter from my hon. Friend. It stated:

"Thank you for your letter of 5 July enclosing a copy of the letter you had received from Patrick Nicholls.

I read Mr. Nicholls' letter with great interest—especially the second page which included statements that I had never heard before and which sounded quite promising. Eagerly, I began asking questions about Mr. Nicholls' 'third option'. Unfortunately however, I discover that it is not a viable alternative to community programme or employment training, but 'a tinkering round the edges', as it was put to Dundee Survival Group and the Wishart centre have registered their intent to become a Training Manager with reluctance because we cannot see a viable alternative if we wish to serve our client group."

It went on to refer to something which I shall explain briefly. My constituency is a soft fruit growing area and those who are unemployed or who earn very little traditionally go to what is called the berry picking instead of having a holiday. The letter continues:

"I know we're into 'the berry season', but after advertising for care workers in the Job Centre for ten days I have only had two applicants this week! I really cannot see this new scheme being highly sought after come September. For us, as you know, we have the additional problem that trainees will have to face abuse, threats and working with HIV carriers. Who, I ask you, would do that for a tenner a week for the sake of training?"

That is one more voluntary organisation that does not believe that the scheme is a good one.

The Keep Scotland Beautiful campaign, which employs 400 part-time staff under the community programme, will not be able to keep them on when the new Training Commission replaces the Manpower Services Commission in September. The staff, including 25 in Tayside, will be forced back on to the dole. The campaign says that the people that they employ on the scheme

"are exceptionally good at what is almost a sales business, selling a litter-free environment to the public and receiving training they would never have got from the MSC alone."

The Dundee liaison committee on homelessness was concerned about the way in which the Secretary of State could assist those community programmes which may feel under threat. In a letter to me on 11 July 1988, it said:

"We understand that Mr. Fowler, the Secretary of State for Employment, and his Ministers have been putting the case for additional funding from other Government Departments to ensure that those community care schemes which are wholly dependent on Community Programme funding and are unsuitable for Employment Training funding should be able to continue in existence after the end of August. It is now into July and no concrete proposals for alternative funding have appeared."

Where have those suggestions come from? They have come as a result of various discussions that have taken place in Scotland with the Minister of State, Scottish Office, in particular on 22 June when the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations met the Minister, who obviously gave some sign that he would be prepared to consider a scheme.

It would be useful to highlight briefly which services the schemes provide and then to put on record the separate funding that they would require. The social care schemes supported by the community programme include care attendance scheme, lunch clubs, gardening and decorating for the elderly, services for the disabled, support for single parents, children's creches and adventure playgrounds, youth clubs, home insulation and support for ex-offenders. It would be easy for the Minister to say that all those areas could provide training. Unfortunately, in almost every case they are a scaled-down version of professional, full-time employment. If that training went too far, it would come into contact with that professional area and therefore would have to be discontinued.

The meeting on 22 June proposed two ways of using the programme. The first suggestion was:

"Scottish Office Departments with responsibility for 'Care in the Community' services should set up a Social Care Fund for a transitional two-year period. The Department of Employment might be expected to contribute towards the costs of the Fund in recognition of the contribution the Fund would make to maintain the maximum choice of quality training places."

It goes on:

"a fund of £1 million would allow for 200 places per year. Applications for funding would be assessed and awards made by a committee of officials of the funding Departments of the Scottish Office and by MSC Scotland."

It goes on to say that after a two-year period the recipients obviously would have to find alternative funding, but it would give the community programmes a chance to find alternative funding.

Another suggestion to which the council has received no response yet is for

[Mr. Ernie Ross]

"the MSC to contribute to the 'core' costs of providers of social care training opportunities within Employment Training."

Perhaps the Minister will respond to those two initiatives. Some of the community organisations in Dundee and in Scotland as a whole which are extremely concerned may consider entering the scheme.

The Scottish Trades Union Congress and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have made it quite clear that they are not prepared to participate in the new employment training scheme. They had a meeting with the Minister on 14 July and I spoke to them today. They said that during that meeting the Minister conceded that he had nothing further to add to the assurances that they sought, which were similar to those sought by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), that the scheme would remain voluntary, at least during this Parliament. The Minister still could not give them an answer.

That is extremely important for local authorities, given that the Secretary of State for Scotland, like the Minister with responsibilities for England and Wales, has clawed back considerable amounts of money from those local authorities. The Minister is still considering the plea from local authorities for extra funding for the additional financial aspects of the scheme, if they were to become training managers. He still cannot give them an assurance that if they joined the scheme and used their own funds to top up the money that the trainee would receive the Government would not claw back the money through some form of penalty. Unless the Minister can give some affirmative response to that, it is unlikely that the STUC or COSLA will be able to encourage their members to enter the scheme.

There are many other aspects on which I should like to concentrate, such as the experiences of my colleagues and me in Germany and America. It was an experience to go to the land of capitalism and see how it is retraining its workers. It was an eye-opener to see what the Secretary of State for Employment had seen when he visited the United States.

I welcome the decision to provide a weekly sum for women to enable them to return to work, but the scheme does not go far enough. It does not deal with mothers who have children under school age, so we are still discriminating against women who do not have enough money to send their children to nursery schools or to day care centres. They cannot therefore return to work. That was not what we found in West Germany or the United States. The Secretary of State now has the assistance of an adviser from the other side of the Atlantic, who we hope will be able to influence the Secretary of State and his team. We hope that it will result in the good practices in the United States being followed in this country.

The Under-Secretary of State must refer to the organisations that provide care. He must not just say that the Government hope to do something for them in the future. These organisations need to know now whether they can seriously commit themselves to employment training. It is no use if they operate for a short time and then discover that they have to fold up because money is no longer provided for them. Unless the Under-Secretary of State can give the assurance for which the Scottish Trades Union Congress and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have asked, the organisations that provide care will disappear and the people of Scotland will suffer a serious loss. The Minister must give that assurance tonight. These organisations must know exactly what the Government intend to do so that the viability of the employment training initiative can be ensured.

8.32 pm

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): I am a member of the Select Committee, but, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), the Chairman of the Committee, has already said, we have not yet discussed the details of employment training and reached a decision. He put forward his personal view, as did the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross). It is only right, therefore, that I should do the same. The House will not be entirely surprised when I say that I do not agree completely with what they have said. There is a dire skills shortage in many parts of the country. My constituency unemployment rate stands at 2·8 per cent., and we face terrible problems when we try to recruit for all forms of business. There are pages and pages of vacancies advertisements in local newspapers.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My hon. Friend represents a constituency with extremely low unemployment, but I represent a constituency with one of the highest unemployment rates in the country. I have received today from the Teesside chamber of commerce details of the skill shortages that it expects to see during the next three months. There are still shortages in every grade, from skilled labour to part-time workers.

Mr. Paice: I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention. It demonstrates that the problem affects the whole country and all businesses.

I am surprised that so many Opposition Members have defended the community programme. They slanged it for many years, but now they say that it has been useful. I am not sorry to see its demise. It was always a make-work system. It provided very little good-quality training. In fact, very little training at all was provided and it achieved very little. I understand the worries in the voluntary sector, but it is not the role of the employment training programme to provide the services that are needed in the community. They should be provided in some other way. The new adult programme that is to start in September will be much more flexible than any of the previous schemes. It begins with an assessment of each trainee. As any expert in training knows, the best programme starts with an individual assessment to tailor the training to the needs of the trainee.

For many reasons I welcome the introduction of child care benefit for single parents. In three or four years we shall desperately need those people in the work force. I welcome, too, the flexibility that the supplementary grants system will provide for specific skills training, for which extra money will be required.

I am sorry that the business enterprise training programme has been incorporated in the new scheme. The private enterprise programme for the would-be entrepreneur and the would-be self-employed is to continue. That is good, but it is strange that as soon as people have got their business off the ground they will lose the opportunity for further training, other than through the new programme. That is where the business enterprise training programme would be of help.

A great deal has been said about the financial benefits that would be provided for the person who is being trained. It is strange to say in one breath that training is vital and we need to spend more on it and to emphasise its value but in the next breath to say that it is not worth while for people to be trained for an extra £5 a week. They are contradictory statements. Everybody on the scheme will be at least £5 a week better off.

Mention has already been made of the Select Committee's visit to Germany two weeks ago. We looked at the dual track programme and the adult programme. German unemployment benefit is paid as a percentage of the unemployed person's previous wage, but there is also a premium, apart from the benefits system, for the adult programme. That premium is 5 per cent. of the unemployed person's previous wage. That works out, on an average industrial wage, at about £4 a week.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman must work it out properly. His figure is wrong.

Mr. Paice: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) makes a sedentary intervention, but she will have to go to Germany and check the figures for herself. Members on both sides of the House visited Germany and they will vouch for the fact that that figure is correct.

Ms. Short: The average wage in Britain is considerably higher than the £80 a week that was implied by the figure that the hon. Gentleman gave, and the average wage in Germany is considerably higher than that. There is something wrong with the hon. Gentleman's arithmetic.

Mr. Paice: I said specifically that the premium was 5 per cent. of the average industrial wage, and 5 per cent. of £80 is £4.

There is no doubt that there is a very great need for effective training. I entirely endorse the comments on that point made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East. I would demur only with his suggestion that we have not achieved anything like it. In my view, the youth training scheme, and now the new employment programme, are very much what the country wants. Contrary to the opinion held by many, I believe that they are comparable to the programmes offered by many of our major industrial competitors in the West.

I grow tired of hearing Opposition Members, trade unionists and others criticising those programmes on the evidence of a few isolated instances. On that basis they castigate the whole scheme. As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, I served for a number of years on an area manpower board. The sadness is that the vast majority of those involved do not really know a great deal about training and are not involved in monitoring or able to make the kind of assessment that matters. If individuals, be they Opposition Members or trade unionists, wish to criticise a particular training programme in a particular place, they should take their criticism to the MSC and ask what is being done to improve the standards. It serves no purpose to castigate the whole scheme.

Mr. Ernie Ross: We had experience of a group who pretended that they were capable of training young people. I went to the MSC and to the Secretary of State for Scotland about that matter and we exchanged a great deal of correspondence. Despite the fact that there was evidence to show that that group was not carrying out its responsibilities, it was given approved training organisation status.

Mr. Paice: I shall not disagree with the hon. Gentleman because I do not know the details of the case. However, I also know of managing agents who were given approved training organisation status but who should never have been granted it. That underlines my earlier point that many of the people who are sitting in judgment on area manpower boards are unfit to make those judgments. That applies to trade unionists as much as to others who are nominated for election to those boards. I do not want to digress and talk about the YTS but will continue my discourse on the adult programme.

Many of the major objections to the adult programme come from trade unions and local authorities operating in areas of greatest need and of high unemployment. Mention has already been made of the "rate for the job". That demonstrates a total lack of understanding of what training is all about. There is no such thing as the rate for the job if one is being effectively trained. In reality, employers will have to make massive contributions to the funding of the schemes. It must also be recognised that the contribution made to a business by unskilled labour is minimal. There is no justification for saying that the employer should pay the rate for the job because the trainee is making a contribution to the business, because he is not. I hope that that attitude represents the final dregs of "The country owes us a living" culture, which brought Britain down in the 1970s. It is time that we——

Mr. Ernie Ross: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that specific point?

Mr. Paice: No, I shall not give way again.

It is time that we got away from cradle to the grave employment and recognised the need for training through one's lifetime and for retraining, however unfortunate may be the reason—including unemployment. Training is not just about time serving. We must abandon the belief that it takes years to learn new skills. That was in the old days of the "Sit by Nellie" approach to training, whereby one was supposed to sit and watch, and learn over the years. Modern training technology has developed a long way since those days, and time scales for the assimilation of skills have been dramatically reduced.

The programme recognises that skill shortages exist, as we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). It also builds on modern training principles and practices. It offers the opportunity to all unemployed people to gain the skills that they need. It is very sad that the scheme is not being welcomed and recognised as being good and valuable, building on the strengths that the YTS developed over the years. The new programme should be welcomed by all who really care about the unemployed and the unskilled.

8.45 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): During the present prolonged spell of high unemployment and lack of job opportunities, the provision of proper training schemes becomes a matter of major importance. I remain unconvinced that the Government's proposals are in any way the best method of proceeding. However, if the alternative is straightforward unemployment, the schemes clearly become the lesser of two evils.

Ideally, my party would like to see introduced a proper system of training similar to those of other European countries, and adequately funded and geared to the changing needs of industry, commerce and the individual employees in a rapidly changing world. I regret that the Government have chosen to abandon the rate for the job that was previously paid under the community programme in favour of a benefit plus system—a premium of between £10 and £12 a week, thus leaving its single, under 25-year-old trainees, who represent about 50 per cent. of total trainees, about £10 worse off for a full week of training and work experience than they would have been as part-time community project workers.

I know that that situation is posing major difficulties for existing schemes in my constituency. In the city of Brechin, current schemes run by an energetic Church minister have transformed the lives of otherwise unemployed individuals, giving them employment, improving the local environment, and leading to a high success rate in finding consequent employment. That excellent scheme is now threatened by the Government changes, which mean that individuals will cease to be offered a working wage—and that was at the heart of the previous scheme's attractiveness. Unless local government funding is obtained, that particular scheme will founder and the whole community will be the poorer for it. With cutbacks in local government funding, the chances of obtaining that money from local authorities are growing more and more remote.

By replacing community benefit with job training as the main focus, the Government put at risk about £50 million of Scottish social care projects that may not be able to adapt to the new scheme. I ask the Minister to examine the specific problems being posed to organisations such as the Angus Crossroads caring scheme and other caring groups by proposed changes in employment training programmes. I know of the tremendously good work being done by those groups and the advantages that they offer to families and to individuals by the programmes they have been allowed to initiate and undertake. Some tremendous local initiatives and services will be destroyed unless proper funding is restored.

I reiterate the fears already expressed by organisations such as the Tayside services liaison committee on alcohol, whose employment scheme may be wiped out. The supported flats made available under the Dundee Cyrenians scheme may also have to close. The Wishart centre's effectiveness as a day centre will be greatly reduced, and the Dundee survival group will be struggling to continue its tremendous services for the homeless. The fears expressed by those voluntary caring organisations are repeated in my constituency and throughout Scotland.

Over the past five years, many voluntary organisations have been able to utilise the community programme to the benefit of various needy groups. Organisations that are first and foremost service-giving cannot also take on a major training role without their services suffering. I direct the Minister to those organisations and to the concerns that they express. That point is of particular importance to Scotland, where a proportionately greater number of programmes have been concerned with community care rather than with the environment, as is the case in England and Wales.

I know that approaches are being made by many of those organisations to the relevant local authorities, but with the severe constraints in local authority budgets the chances of obtaining funding are limited. I believe that the Secretary of State for Employment mentioned the possibility of other Government Departments being asked to find funds to assist voluntary organisations that have developed caring schemes under the community programme. What reassurances can the Minister give Crossroads and other community schemes about future funding?

Many parts of Scotland need job creation schemes as well as training schemes—indeed, some would say more. I believe that the Government's offering is hopelessly inadequate. Not more than £400 is, I understand, to be spent per six-month trainee. Sweden spends £12,000 on training its unemployed, whereas the average employment training place here will cost about £5,000 a year. While value for money is always a desirable goal, mere cheapness can be self-defeating. Moreover, restart and the stricter eligibility conditions for unemployment benefit mean that even without formal workfare compulsion the scheme is highly coercive, as has been said earlier. As no time scale is attached to ministerial guarantees of the voluntary status of the scheme, no wonder such concerns are being voiced.

Because of the abandoning of the rate for the job, employment training had destroyed the political consensus that supported the community programme and was one of its strengths. The voluntary sector warned that that would happen. Now voluntary agencies are caught between dependence on local authority funding and trade union good will on the one hand, and the need for MSC funding on the other.

May I suggest some methods that might help such voluntary organisations? Would the Government consider, for example, allowing the Training Commission to permit agency contracts for the community programme to be extended until the end of February 1989, as with project contracts, to provide time for negotiation with local authorities? Could an additional £10 a week premium be payable to single people to bring their weekly income close to what they would have received as a rate for the job? That, I believe, would cost approximately £150 million on a total budget of £1·5 billion, so it is certainly financially feasible.

Initially, the Scottish Office—or the Minister's Department—could exempt local authorities from clawback penalties on the amount that they spend on topping up trainees' incomes. Perhaps a community fund outwith employment training could be introduced to which agencies feeling that they could not provide a quality caring service within employment training could apply for transitional funding.

The scheme is far from ideal. I hope that the Government will look again at funding in Scotland for caring schemes that not only provide employment, but are a crucial lifeline for individuals and their families who are helped by them.

8.53 pm

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I welcome this huge employment training scheme, which is probably larger than any such scheme over the past 25 years. I do not think that it is putting it too strongly to say that training, more than anything, will determine our economic growth over the next few years. It is equally true that the problems of skill shortages are the result of demography as well as the industrial restructuring of the past few years. The demographic problems are well known, although it is worrying to see that the National Economic Development Office survey showed last week that only one in seven employees was aware of them. Nevertheless, there has been an increase of 900,000 in the work force, and between 1987 and 1995 1 million fewer 16-to-19 year-olds will be available for training. That is a source of potentially severe skill shortages in apprenticeships, technicianships and the other forms of training available to young people at present.

The problems are by no means new, and they are common to the whole industrialised world. We have recently been told by Professor Charles Handy that 70 per cent. of jobs over the next 10 years will be knowledge-related, whereas 20 years ago the proportion was only 30 per cent. It has been estimated, probably more cogently, that by the year 2010 even people who stay in the same job will have to be almost completely reskilled three times in their working lives.

Mr. Batiste: Does that apply to Members of Parliament?

Mr. Coombs: I do not know.

Evidence of that is working through into the labour market. While we have 1·8 million extra jobs since 1983, and although we have 700,000 vacancies in the economy, the Engineering Industry Training Board shows that the increase in vacancies is mainly in such industries as electronics, in which vacancies have increased by 95 per cent. over the past nine years, and in instrumentation, where the increase has been 30 per cent. Those skilled industries are creating the demand for labour. Although the demand for engineering operatives, for example, has fallen by 43 per cent. over the past nine years, the demand for technicians and scientists has risen by over a half.

That is why, when we are talking about a high demand for the skilled, flexible worker, I welcome the employment training scheme, not only because of its size but, more important, because of its emphasis on quality. I applaud the youth training schemes, approved training organisations, competence objectives, transferable qualifications and, perhaps most important, the requirement for a knowledge of computers and information technology on every youth scheme.

I have no doubt that the employment training scheme, with its broad scope from literacy to high technology, will be a better-quality scheme than we have ever seen before. Evidence presented to the Select Committee showed that in the west midlands, although there were only 35,000 places available, 125,000, applications were received from trainee managers. A point was made earlier about smaller funding for more places. We should remember that a large proportion of those trainee managers will bring private capital into the scheme to improve the quality of training that it provides.

I believe that the scheme will do an important job in countering skill shortages. However, although the Government should give a lead in tackling skill shortages, the primary responsibility for skill training should be and is with employers. As the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) said, that is a truth which we in Britain have been slow to grasp. For example, a survey was carried out in 1984. The figures for vocational training were difficult to obtain, but it was estimated that the private sector in Britain was spending £2·5 billion compared with £7 billion in West Germany. As a result, Germany was producing three times more engineers than we were. That is still a worrying factor. Two out of three firms in Britain do no training.

Although the good firms spend the equivalent of 4 per cent. of labour costs on vocational and educational training, the average in the United Kingdom is only 2 per cent., and that works out at 0·7 per cent. of turnover. That is ironic when the economic monitor, the Engineering Industry Training Board, says that 43 per cent. of firms complain that skill shortages will constrain their growth over the next six months, yet apprentice recruitment is still only 8,000 a year.

It is equally ironic that, when we are talking about skills shortages in microelectronics, a Policy Studies Institute survey showed that only 51 per cent. of firms were doing any staff retraining. It is also ironic that when apprenticeships are so valuable, half the industrial apprenticeships available in my constituency go unfilled.

The Government are providing help on such matters through, for example, open technology, the regional technical centres, projects such as Trident to improve links between schools and industry and by making sure that the youth training scheme is more clearly and closely linked to the needs of, for instance, the engineering industry. I understand that the engineering industry has just set up a youth training scheme which gives 53 weeks of off-the-job training rather than the normal 30 weeks.

There is no doubt that the major power to solve skills shortages lies with the employer. I should like to see more employers taking up the joint scheme between the National Economic Development Office, the Engineering Industry Training Board, the City and Guilds organisation and the Training Commission to train more craft workers on the German meister system. I understand that the take-up has been poor recently. I should like to see more employers take up the signposter initiative and the Engineering Industry Training Board's green site and primary projects initiative with schools. I should like to see further development of the segmented craft engineering traineeships by companies. Most of all, I should like to see companies give a far higher priority to the recruitment of scientists and engineers.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman should get the Government to do something about it.

Mr. Coombs: This is a private sector responsibility.

When the private sector is paying newly-qualified engineers on average only £10,800 a year and technicians £8,300 a year, about the same as the average industrial wage, it is not surprising that they find it difficult to encourage people into the industry. It was worrying to hear the vice-chancellor of the Open university tell the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts yesterday that, although it is easy to get firms to pay for business studies training for their employees at the Open university, only 30 per cent. of them regularly pay for scientific or technical training. It is in the interests of private sector firms to do that. It is their responsibility. They are the best people to do the training and, in increasing numbers, they must accept that responsibility.

Perhaps understandably, some companies in the small firms sector are put off going into training by the multiplicity of schemes and sources of funding. That is one of the problems addressed by the consultation document on the funding of vocational and educational training, which I understand is still out for consultation. It is daunting that some training schemes are the responsibility of the British Institute of Management, the CBI, universities, and industrial bodies and yet others are the responsibility of different Government Departments.

I hope that as a result of the review of vocational and educational training those schemes will be drawn together, at least in terms of the way in which information about them is disseminated if not in the way they are organised. I hope that greater emphasis will be put on local employer networks within each local education authority, using the chambers of commerce to develop joint schemes between employers which will stimulate training and prevent poaching of trainees between firms.

The final area in which the Government are making a contribution but where more needs to be done and will be done when the Education Reform Bill is enacted is the need to ensure that young people have the necessary qualifications to enter the engineering industry in the first place. It is significant that the qualification for a technician in the engineering industry through the Engineering Industry Training Board will be four passes at GCSE grades A to C. However, only 26 per cent. of school leavers at the moment get passes in O-level mathematics and physics. That will be exacerbated by the declining number of pupils over the next few years. The reason for that low figure is too much specialisation in the fourth year in schools and the fact that too many students drop scientific and technical subjects and mathematics. In Scotland, schools have started to address that problem and, as a result, they have one third more people who are qualified in those subjects.

The Government, through the national curriculum, will, I hope, begin to solve that in a big way. The national curriculum, the technical and vocational education initiative incentive grants to teachers of shortage subjects and education support grants should lead to more pupils taking a wider range of technical subjects. That will form the bedrock of the solution to the skill shortage in this country.

9·6 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I should like first to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), the Chairman of the Employment Select Committee, on his contribution at the beginning of this first-class debate. I listened to every word he said. There is no doubt that my hon. Friend knows what he is talking about when he speaks about training. I should also like to congratulate hon. Members on both sides of the House who are members of that Select Committee and who have contributed to the debate. All of them do a first-class job in the Select Committee.

Ms. Short: All of them?

Mr. Haynes: Yes, all of them, under the leadership of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East. I kicked off by congratulating him because the Select Committee would not work properly if he was not at the helm.

I also want to congratulate the Secretary of State for Employment on being here during the debate. I shall not give way to him, but I welcome him to the debate on training. However, he was not present very often when this year's Employment Bill was in Committee. He was swanning around in Sweden and here, there and everywhere, but my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was there regularly and he is here tonight, so I congratulate him. I felt that I must make that point about attendance.

I also want to speak about the principle of training. I shall not go into all the fine details, as the Select Committee does, but I wish to talk about the principle. I went into the pits in 1944 and I had first-class training. The training that was talked about in Committee and the training that the Government propose is labour on the cheap. The Government have poked their noses right into training instead of leaving it to industry. I was trained in industry and the Government had nothing to do with it.

I started at 50 per cent. of the rate of the chap I worked alongside, who was an experienced man. I worked at the coal face during the two-year training course and every two months I got a percentage increase. After two years, I was fully qualified and got the same rate as the other man. That is why this scheme is unfair—it is labour on the cheap. Youngsters in my constituency let me know that in no uncertain terms. I am here on their behalf to tell the Government that the system is unfair, not only for youngsters but for the people who have been taken out of employment because of the Government policies.

There used to be nine pits in my constituency. Now four are left because they got rid of five. Where are all the youngsters and the people who worked in those pits? They have gone on the dole queue. Now the Government provide money for training under the NCB (Enterprise) Ltd scheme. They hold seminars and issue leaflets urging people to take another regular job and retrain outside miming in some other industry. People have been encouraged to accept redundancy so that the Government can do away with the pits and no one will work in them again.

NCB (Enterprise) Ltd., paid for by the Government, means that these people cannot go on training schemes unless they are guaranteed a job. That is a con trick. If the pits had not been closed they could have continued working in them and contributed to the energy requirements of the nation. We heard a statement today on the nuclear industry, and there will be more. The Opposition said long ago that we would go back to the coal mining industry. I am sorry that we have problems. Once a pit is closed it is finished—it cannot be reopened. We must open new pits in the new seams throughout the country.

The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt)—he is probably on the train back home now—spoke of a shortage of skilled workers in his constituency. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) agreed with him and said that there were such shortages across the whole nation. The tragedy of all this is that the Conservatives have been in office for 10 years now and have not done a great deal about the problem. We are still struggling to provide skilled workers. If the Government went about it in the right way we might get somewhere. They should listen to some of the things being said by Opposition Members such as myself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] I do not know what the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) is laughing about: he does not know what work is. I do. I had to work to keep a family, but his lot are professionals. They have lived on easy street. Some of the beggars are working outside as well, earning up to five or more salaries, while the poor devils that we represent are trying to get work and cannot. And they are conned with this so-called training scheme. It is training on the cheap all right.

The Secretary of State has said the scheme is voluntary, but there is nothing voluntary in this flaming scheme. I remember the right hon. Gentleman saying something in Committee about people's social security benefits being taken away if they did not go on the scheme. Now the right hon. Gentleman sits there blinking at me, but he knows what I am talking about. The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) served on the Standing Committee and made a contribution or two—he was one of the few Tories to do so. Opposition Members had to do it all; we had to put Conservative Members in the picture about what was going on.

Every now and again, the Government change the name and direction of their training schemes. They do not even know where they are going. I wish they would listen to what the Opposition say about training. When people who have lost their jobs through Government policy manage to find a job, I will go along with the Government's scheme—but the jobs are not there. In my constituency, I have youngsters who have gone through the two-year training scheme but cannot find a job at the end of it. There is still 12 per cent. unemployment in my constituency. The Government say that unemployment stands still, but in my constituency unemployment will rise and rise because of what is happening.

I believe that the Government are planning further pit closures in my constituency—in addition to the four that have already closed—which will make matters even worse. That will affect not only the industry in my constituency, but suppliers there and in other constituencies. It is a difficult problem, but the Government do not listen. They know it all. They are dogmatic. People must do what they say. We have had enough; we have had a bellyfull; and I tell the Government that the next time that the Prime Minister declares that there will be an election, that lot over there can look out.

9.15 pm

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) talked about labour on the cheap, but I think that that was a Whip's speech on the cheap to cover up the fact that there is nobody else on the Labour Benches to speak in this debate. That is what it is all about. He might have his fan club up there in the Strangers Gallery—all one of them—but where are the rest of them? There are none.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What the hon. Gentleman is saying is totally unfair. He knows full well that my hon. Friends are now back working in their constituencies.

Mr. Riddick: They might be back in their constituencies working, but some of us are trying to represent our constituencies here in the Chamber—that is the difference.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this fascinating and riveting debate on the important topic of training. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) that British industry has let down the nation to a certain extent in this sector. It has not provided enough training. It must be said, however, that Governments of the past two or three decades have not allowed British industry to earn sufficient profits to invest in training.

Like the hon. Member for Ashfield, I had a proper job before I came here. I used to work in sales management in industry—the coal face of industry. I first started work with an American company called Procter and Gamble, which had an American business culture. It carried out all its own training and invested heavily in its own people. I was then poached from the American company—after it had invested in my training and had improved my effectiveness—by a British company, which was fairly typical.

I recently met one of the directors of the Confederation of British Industry in Yorkshire. He told me that at a time of deep recession training and research and development are the things that tend to go. He assured me, however, that once the profitability of British industry picked up, training would be back on the agenda, and it would invest in training once again. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran), who used to be with the CBI, will confirm that that will happen in the future.

That is a question of training people already in work. Tonight we are debating the Government's proposal and their massive training role to help the long-term unemployed. There is an enormous need for high quality training which cannot be over-emphasised. The change in the pattern of job vacancies demonstrates the need for skilled people. There are fewer vacancies for manual, unskilled workers in manufacturing industry, but a far greater demand for individuals in the professional, managerial, technological and service sectors who have the appropriate skills.

If we consider manufacturing industry, it is significant that from the low point of the recession in 1981 to the present day, as the economy has picked up, output has risen by 22·3 per cent. During that same period, employment in manufacturing industry has fallen by 1·1 million—a drop of 18·2 per cent. In other words, productivity has increased by about 40 per cent. British industry needs fewer unskilled manual workers.

However, unemployment remains high. At the same time, the CBI and the chambers of commerce and trade in Yorkshire and elsewhere are reporting very serious skill shortages. For example, an ice-cream factory on Merseyside reported that it could not find enough maintenance fitters or refrigeration engineers. In Manchester, seven new hotels can barely find the staff to open their doors.

The jobs exist. Moreover, now that the baby boom of the 1960s has flattened out, there are marvellous opportunities for our young people. However, we must ensure that the long-term unemployed in their 30s, 40s or 50s are not ignored. They must not be left on the scrap heap. That is why the new training scheme is so important.

How do the Opposition react? Apart from the playful little speech from the hon. Member for Ashfield, Opposition Members react with a mixture of bewilderment —in some cases a measure of support and in others downright opposition. The dinosaurs in the union movement, notably the Transport and General Workers Union, the National and Local Government Officers Association and the National Union of Public Employees, complain about workfare and cheap labour. However, they claim to champion the cause of the working class and the unemployed. What humbug.

The response of employers and training organisations to the employment training programme has been very good but if the trade unions wish to cause trouble they can; but if they do that they and hon. Members opposite—in particular, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) who has been stirring things up to such an enormous degree—will bear a very heavy responsibility for depriving some of the most unfortunate people in society of an opportunity to better themselves and have a chance in life.

Instead of complaining about cheap labour many of the long-term unemployed will welcome the opportunity of a long-term future and will then sell their newly-found, newly-learned skills at a decent wage to companies that are prepared to employ them.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) referred to the prospects of the new employment scheme, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said under his breath in a rather threatening way, "We shall see." He does not want it to succeed because the Labour party likes to see high unemployment. It believes that that is good for its political prospects. It is unfortunate that the hon. Member for Oldham, West makes many ambiguous noises about this and gets the hon. Member for Ladywood to do all his dirty work for him. Whatever the dinosaurs of the Labour movement do, the new scheme will start in September and give the long-term unemployed a chance to learn new skills to take long-term job opportunities. The Government are to be congratulated on giving them that chance.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I am sure that we are all grateful to the Select Committee on Employment for giving us an opportunity to debate this important subject. My hon. Friends regret that the debate has been on a Thursday evening as many of them have had to return to their constituencies. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why"] One only has to stand in the post office to see that the quantity of mail received by Labour Members compared with that received by Conservative Members shows who does more work for their constituents.

Like every hon. Member who has spoken, I want to concentrate on employment training—ET. It is just as ugly as the original ET, but with none of his lovable qualities. Before doing so, I should like to mention youth training. I put on record the Opposition's deep resentment and opposition to the removal of the right to benefit for 16 to 18-year-olds, thus making the youth training scheme compulsory. The level of refusal to take up YTS was low. We do not believe for a moment that that action was necessary to make young people take up further education and training. It was done so that the allowance paid to young people on YTS, which has decreased over the years —the Government deliberately allowed it to be eroded —could decrease further.

It was deeply wrong to remove young people's freedom to choose their training scheme. Good quality training schemes should give young people a freedom of choice. Out of desperation, because they have no income, young people are having to take the first scheme on offer, whatever its quality. Even worse—this has had a big impact in my constituency—the right of young people in receipt of benefit—whose families cannot support their children aged 16 to 18 years in full-time education—to study at their local further education college, take O or A-levels and vocational qualifications has been wiped out by the loss of the right to study for 21 hours. That is an outrage and the option should not be destroyed but expanded to allow young people to stay in full-time education. We are behind in the number of young people who stay in further education compared with our competitor countries. We are deeply critical of the moves that the Government have made in removing the freedom of choice for YTS schemes and young people's opportunities to study full-time if they so wish.

Mr. Paice: The hon. Lady decried the allowance paid to YTS trainees and said that it was decreasing. Does the hon. Lady accept that the amount paid is a minimum, not a maximum, and that many work experience placements pay considerably more in addition? That is constantly increasing, so to talk about the minimum as the norm is quite incorrect.

Ms. Short: A minority of YTS placements receive top-up. It is important that top-up is allowed. It is deeply regrettable that top-up is not being allowed in the employment training scheme, although the model is identical to YTS. We know that a growing minority of young people on YTS are receiving top-up, but if the YTS allowance had remained at the original value of the youth opportunities programme allowance it would be worth not £20+ but £40+. I hope that as the 16 to 18-year-old cohort declines, more young people will be in work with training and not taking any job to avoid YTS. That is what is happening at present and the Government must take action. I hope that more young people on YTS will receive top-up and a decent wage and that the possibility of using top-up under YTS will be used by the trade union movement to improve the position of young people in the labour market. That is not only desirable but likely to happen.

I now refer to the adult training scheme, or ET, as the Government have now decided to call it. The Opposition's view is that it is a deeply flawed scheme and a tragically wasted opportunity to provide improved training for the long-term unemployed. There is a desperate need to expand training opportunities for everyone, but, in particular, for the long-term unemployed, because of the changes that are taking place in our economy. Conservative Member after Conservative Member has said how deplorable it is that we have skill shortages and that there is not more training. The Government have been in power for nearly 10 years. They have eroded training mechanisms. They have cut the number of skillcentres, got rid of the industrial training boards, cut the apprenticeship system, and so on. They deplore the lack of training in our country. It is a serious lack for the economy and for the quality of life and work for individuals, and the Government are responsible for it. They should organise things so that we have more training rather than less training. ET is deeply flawed, but we desperately need more and better training for the long-term unemployed.

It is also our view that the community programme, which is now to be abolished, has provided enormously valuable schemes to care for some of the most needy and desperate people in our communities. For example, in my constituency, mobility for the disabled is provided through a community programme. It includes decorating many elderly people's homes, doing up their gardens, schemes for disabled children, and so on. They are important community services, but we do not believe that they are all that should be on offer to the long-term unemployed. We have always argued that the CP should not have been only part-time but should have been a mixture of part-time and full-time work, according to people's needs.

There should have been more training opportunities for the long-term unemployed. When crucial services were being provided through the CP to some of the most vulnerable people in our communities, the jobs should have been permanent. Long-term unemployed people should have been given priority for such jobs. As they acquired skills and knowledge through working with such vulnerable people, they should have been allowed permanently to stay in their jobs and use their skills to take care of the local community, instead of constantly being forced to leave the scheme just as they had learnt to do their jobs particularly well.

We have consistently argued that point. That has always been our view. We said it when CP was first launched, we said it throughout the life of CP, and we say it now. Instead, what do we get? We get employment training, which builds on the failed job training scheme, rather than the best of the community programme. We continue to be told that it is a £1·5 billion programme. Of course, that is not true. There was some training in the community programme. Many schemes funded and organised training for themselves. After a great deal of pressure on the Government, funding was provided for training. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members who do not know about these matters would listen, they might learn something. After the scheme was launched, the Government provided funding for training in the time when people were not working. It was building up nicely, and the Government cut the budget. We demanded training. At last we got a budget, the programme was starting to build, and the Government deliberately cut the money. Conservative Members should not tell us about the lack of training in the community programme. When they launched the programme it failed to provide training and it was a deliberate part of the Government's strategy to cut the training that we later squeezed out of them.

I was referring to ET. We are constantly told that the budget is £1·5 billion. Of course, people on the scheme are to be paid £10 or a little more on top of their benefit. A large part of the budget is simply benefit money that people would otherwise receive. We are talking about half that amount of money. It is not such a big budget. Conservative Members should face up to that fact and be honest about it.

As someone who had worked in this subject for many years before I was elected to the House, written reports, done research and demanded improvements in schemes and more training before most Conservative Members even knew their way around the initials of the Manpower Services Commission, it is my view that, in their obsessive desire to cut wage levels, the Government have constantly destroyed our efforts to improve training opportunities for young people and the long-term unemployed. The Government use the schemes to lower wage expectations and restructure the labour market. The expectations of young people in employment have been deliberately lowered by the youth training scheme and a number of other schemes which subsidise employers who pay low wages. The success of that is measurable. Much of the inspiration behind this scheme has been the search to reduce the wage expectations and conditions of those in employment. Because the Government have that ulterior motive, they are throwing away a major opportunity to improve our training provisions for long-term unemployed people.

Some of us remember when the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) was the Secretary of State for Employment—all these measures were tried before. He tried to bring in the removal of benefit rights as a means of forcing trainees on to YTS. He tried to introduce benefit-plus for the long-term unemployed, but he failed. He then threatened to abolish the Manpower Services Commission because he was so angry about having failed. The MSC now has much less independence and authority than it used to have. The Government now have compulsory YTS and are bringing in the benefit-plus scheme because they seek to lower the wage expectations and not because they wish to help the long-term unemployed or improve our training provision.

We object to the benefit-plus model because one of the most immediate and desperate experiences of the long-term unemployed is poverty. Any of us could live on benefit for a short time because we have things that we have bought in better times and we might have a little in savings. However, if one is forced to live on benefit levels for months or years, one becomes extremely poor and cannot replace shoes, children's clothing, sheets, or bedding. The overwhelming experience of those who are long-term unemployed is grinding continuous poverty. Conservative Members talk about the need for people to make sacrifices to obtain training, but they do not know the reality of the poverty in which people have had to live.

This morning I received a letter from a constituent who was desperately upset. After three years of unemployment, he had found a place on a community programme and received £90 per week for working three days one week and two days the next. He said how happy he had been, how he worked hard because he always worked hard, that he liked working and was proud to work and that it made him feel better. He has just been told that he will be put on benefit-plus, get £10 and have to work full-time. He is distraught because he does not understand it and feels insulted. He had felt that his life was just getting better. He has written to me, pleading that I represent his case and try to get something better for him.

I advise Conservative Members that when this scheme hits the streets and many more people experience what is on offer, and when the overwhelming majority of 18 to 25-year-olds who predominate on the community programme and who are the guarantee or primary group for this programme, find that they are about £20 a week worse off, they will be extremely angry. There will be a lot of hostility to the programme.

Mr. Riddick: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way. I have heard what she has been saying about poverty being the major problem, but surely another major problem facing long-term unemployed people is boredom. They are bored because they have nothing to do. Surely this is an opportunity for them to learn some new skills and to have a new start in life. That is what the programme is about.

Ms. Short: There is absolutely no question but that poverty is the primary problem. Other problems are that the long-term unemployed are isolated from society, and feel that they have no friends and that they cannot make a contribution. All those things are hurtful to people who then feel demoralised and unwanted, and who start to respect themselves less. They lose the confidence to apply for jobs. We know, because all the research tells us, that that is the effect of long-term unemployment. So what should we do? Should we make them an offer that does not make them any better off so that they have to grind on in poverty or should we make them an offer that gives them the chance to acquire skills and a decent income?

Opposition Members believe that the long-term unemployed are entitled to the chance to acquire skills and a decent income, but the Government are so determined to reduce the wage levels of some of the poorest people in our community that they bring in this kind of scheme, which will impoverish even more those who are already impoverished so that they are worse off than with the offer of the community programme.

It is said that benefit-plus will give an extra £10 per week, or even a little more because some special categories will get £11 and a few pence extra per week. When Conservative Members talk about the degree of TUC approval, they should remember that that "approval" came reluctantly because the TUC had feared something worse if it did not negotiate what it could from the scheme.

We are told that the scheme is the same as the TOPS allowance. People are willing to train full time and people have queued up for TOPS courses for such an allowance. When the skillcentre in my constituency kept waiting lists, they were years long. People wanted to train to obtain a skill in which there was a shortage, so they knew that they would get a job. When people are unproductive they are entitled to a training allowance. That might make them a bit better off compared with what they receive in benefit and they also get their bus fares paid and so on.

When people are put in a workplace and are producing goods and services alongside other workers, they expect to get some pay. They are entitled to an income that takes account of the work that they produce. It is not good enough to say that, in the case of the employment training scheme, they will receive £10 on top of their benefit. They must receive pay in proportion to their productivity. If they do not, they will be used to undermine the jobs and wages of those in work. That is what happened with YTS and YOP. The Minister's Department has produced a number of research papers that have shown that if young people are introduced to the workplace as free labour, they will displace other workers from jobs.

The employment training schemes threatens the long-term unemployed because it is worse than the community programme in terms of those people's income levels. It threatens people in low-paid work—the places on the scheme will be concentrated in such work—because that scheme will be used to displace workers. That is why we, together with many trade unions and many of the long-term unemployed, object to it so strongly.

How cynical can the Government get? I have with me a brochure handed out to employers to try to get them involved in the scheme. What does it tell them?

"Employment Training gives you the opportunity to hire people whose training you have been able to check yourself . . . You might regard the training period as an extended interview."

Now we get down to it. The Government might as well say, "Take on 20. Use them, they are free and keep the ones you want." An "extended interview" is not the high quality training that Conservative Members have tried to pretend the scheme is all about. The Government's expensive advertising budget has been spent trying to pretend that "an extended interview" means high-quality training. It is in their brochure and they are their words, not ours.

Ministers are aware that there is deep opposition to the scheme from the trade union movement, the voluntary sector and many local authorities, including a number of Tory local authorities. There will be a great deal of conflict. Roger Dawe, the director general of the Training Commission, has said that if one wants to learn the lessons from the failure of the JTS one must have consensus, support from local authorities from trade unions and so on.

Ever since the Government introduced the scheme we have pleaded with them to give us some basic assurances. We have sought an assurance that the scheme will be voluntary. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) has already referred to the duplicity of the Secretary of State who has constantly said that he has no plans to designate the scheme under section 26 of the Employment Act 1988 which gives him the power to take away people's social security benefits should they refuse a place on the scheme or leave it early. However, the right hon. Gentleman will not say that he will not designate the scheme. He is playing games. He has no plans to designate it now, but if things go wrong he will do so later. The Government are being dishonest and if they are considering the possibility of designation, they should tell us.

With the new availability-for-work tests there is an increasing compulsion on people to join schemes. People are called in and are threatened with the loss of their benefit. They are asked whether they are looking for a job and what wage level they are willing to accept. If they do not give the right answers they lose benefit anyway. Compulsion is creeping in through the availability-for-work tests and if that does not do the Government's job, they will designate the scheme and make it compulsory.

We are opposed to the scheme because it is not good enough. It is not good enough for the long-term unemployed and it has the potential to destroy the jobs of those already in work. It will not provide good training. We desperately want a scheme that will meet those criteria. If the Government will agree to pay a decent rate when people are working and producing—and an allowance when they are training—and if they give an absolute assurance that the scheme, including the availability-for-work tests, will be voluntary and if they will provide adequate funding for training, we will campaign for the scheme. I plead with the Government to heed what I say and what has been said on many occasions. We shall go out to the trade unions, which are rightly opposed to the scheme, and say, "OK. We have got something better now; let us all work for it."

We want a decent scheme for the long-term unemployed—they vote for us, and a lot of our relatives and friends are part of that group. We have relatives and friends who have been on training schemes and I do not believe that Conservative Members could say the same.

This is a desperately urgent and important matter to us. Of course, we want to form a Government, but in the meantime we want something better for the long-term unemployed and this is not the answer. There will be dissension and conflict and the scheme might well fail. The Government have made a grave error because they are obsessed with cutting the wages of the poorest people in the country.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick Nicholls): In the few minutes available to me, I shall not be able to do justice to the interesting and valuable contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House. I hope that hon. Members will accept that, if they think that I have not given their contribution sufficient treatment.

Before I reply to the specific points that have been raised, I wish to put matters into context. It is obvious that the Select Committee's report and this debate have concentrated primarily on the new employment training programme. That is entirely right, given the significance that we attach to it. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) was right when she said that the Committee had given us a valuable opportunity to discuss those matters.

Employment training will have a budget of about £1·5 billion in a full year, which will make it the largest programme of its kind anywhere in the world. The fact that the Government are investing that sum of money in employment training is a measure of our intent to help the long-term unemployed back into work. The case for training the long-term unemployed is clear and it should command the support of all Members of this House.

The prospect for jobs is better now than it has been for a decade. Unemployment has fallen for 23 months in succession by a total of 835,000, which is the largest and longest sustained fall on record. For the last six months, unemployment has fallen by an average of 40,000 a month. That is a direct reflection of the strength of the British economy. More than 1·8 million additional new jobs have been created since 1983. The economy is entering its eighth successive year of growth at an average rate of 3 per cent.

There is therefore every reason to believe that unemployment will continue to fall, provided that people who have been out of work can take the jobs which are increasingly available. That means, above all, that they need the chance to train in up-to-date skills.

We know from recent surveys that there are some 700,000 unfilled job vacancies in the economy as a whole. We now have a unique opportunity to train the long-term unemployed so that they can take advantage of those opportunities.

However, there is now clear evidence of a concerted campaign of intimidation directed against organisations which want to play a part in employment training. Of course, anybody is entitled to say that he does not want to take part in the new programme, but what is unacceptable is that anyone should try to intimidate other people into boycotting employment training.

There is clear evidence that officials of the Transport and General Workers Union have been involved in a number of violent demonstrations against officials of the Training Commission, the employment service and voluntary organisations that want to run training projects under the new programme.

In March, the newly elected executive of the TGWU voted to oppose employment training, despite the fact that their general secretary, Ron Todd, was one of the MSC commissioners who designed the programme and recommended it unanimously to the Government.

Since then, there has been a series of unpleasant incidents involving members and officials of that union. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment wrote to Mr. Todd about that in April. He undertook to carry out an investigation. We are still awaiting a substantive reply. My right hon. Friend has now had to write to Mr. Todd again to draw his attention to two further incidents. One of those involved the week-long occupation of the Birkenhead job-centre——

Ms. Short: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Lady took more than her fair share of the time and she will have to forgive me if I press on.

One of those incidents involved the week-long occupation of the Birkenhead jobcentre, as a result of which no help could be given to unemployed people in that area. It is absolutely typical of that sort of demonstration that it is the unemployed who suffer.

Now we have the Liverpool city council not only opposing employment training, but threatening action against anyone who seeks to work with it. Liverpool city council, which is, of course under the control of the hard Left, voted on 29 June to boycott employment training. Not content with that, it also voted to take a whole series of steps designed to bully voluntary organisations and private companies in Liverpool into boycotting the programme. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Ladywood does not like what she is hearing, but she will have to realise that she associates herself with those people by holding the views that she does.

If those threats are carried out, the unemployed people of Liverpool will be deprived of training and the elderly and disabled will lose the benefits of many of Liverpool's voluntary services.

Unemployment in Liverpool is higher than the national average. But if the council has its way, it will be even higher because the city's unemployed people will lose the opportunity to train for employment and return to work.

Even after hearing some of the speeches this evening, I remain an optimist and I should like to think that all hon. Members will join me in condemning that attempt to victimise those unemployed people who are most in need of help. It is the same destructive attitude that we saw in

[Mr. Nicholls]

Dundee earlier this year. The conclusion is quite inescapable. If the hard Left cannot have jobs or training on their own terms, it would rather have unemployment. That is its message to the unemployed of Merseyside today, just as it was its message to the unemployed of Dundee in April.

I want to make it absolutely clear that the Government are not going to be deflected by any campaign of intimidation. The programme will go ahead as planned on 5 September. The Government will not turn their back on the unemployed. As a nation we need their skills and experience if we are to sustain our economic growth. I believe it is the duty of everyone in our society—including local authorities and trade unions—to help unemployed people get back to work. That is what employment training is all about and that is what is at stake.

The speech by the hon. Member for Ladywood did nothing to dispel the ambiguity which has surrounded the Opposition's attitude to employment training from the outset. Her speech contained the usual familiar recital of complaints about the programme—complaints which we have answered time after time.

It is obviously asking too much of the hon. Lady, given her particular prejudices, to ask her to take my word for it. Therefore, I refer her to the comments of Mr. Peter Ashby, writing in The Independent. The hon. Lady may sneer, but let us consider Mr. Ashby's credentials. He is not an uncritical supporter of Her Majesty's Government; he is a long-time member of the Labour party. He is a committed trade unionist and he spent three years working for the TUC. He is head of a body called Action on Long-Term Unemployment. This is what he had to say on the views of the hon. Lady, commenting on the views of her hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher):

"Michael Meacher's defence of the Labour Party's policy on employment training is sadly unconvincing."

We are all entitled to an under-statement.

"What he does not answer is the basic question: will the party support employment training?"

He continues:

"It is surely time for Michael Meacher and his colleagues"— and we must assume that they include the hon. Lady—

"to speak out in favour of long-term unemployed people having the option of high-quality public-sector training.

It is too late in the day for those in positions of leadership to remain sitting on the fence. Unless they declare themselves in support of a programme, it will go down at TUC Congress."

He concludes:

"I hope from Mr. Meacher's letter that he is in favour of employment training. If so, could he please tell us in simple English?"

Of course he cannot, and the hon. Lady did not do so either.

In the few minutes that remain, I shall try to deal with some of the central points. Although the hon. Lady knows the facts, it is possible that some of her hon. Friends do not. Yet again she raises the old canard that Tory authorities are not in favour of the scheme. Again she mentions the case of Kensington and Chelsea. I can tell the hon. Lady that the position of Kensington and Chelsea is perfectly honourable. It has decided that for the time being it wants to wait and see, and it made it clear that it will not come into the programme yet. If the hon. Lady thinks that she can derive some satisfaction from that, she is welcome to it.

The hon. Lady is concerned that the programme will not be voluntary. There is not much point in trying to convince the hon. Lady that anything conceived by the Government is a right and proper approach.

The TUC, again not uncritical supporters of the Government, has given its conditional support to the programme. It is absolutely inconceivable that the TUC would have done that if it thought that the Government intended to make the programme compulsory. Accepting for the moment that there are some grounds for the fears of the hon. Member for Ladywood, surely she realises that the moment that we attempted—[Interruption.] If the hon. Lady will stop howling from a sedentary position, I shall try to deal with some of her points, inadequate though they were. If the Government tried to make the programme compulsory, the TUC would immediately withdraw its support and that would be the precise opposite of what we want. If the hon. Lady will not accept my word for it, she ought to reflect on the TUC's attitude.

The hon. Lady well knows that what she is asking the Government to do is to say that they will never at any time in the future invoke the Social Security Act 1975 that was passed by the last Labour Governmnt, at a time when her hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West was a Minister with responsibility for social security. It would go against everything that we have planned and it would be against our best interests to do so.

I am afraid that we have again heard the hon. Lady say tonight that the Labour party is united against the scheme. Again I remind her, if she will not accept my words, of what Neil Fletcher, the chairman of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities education committee, had to say about it. He referred to the hon. Lady's employment training policy as "political posturing" and he is reported as saying that "If the Labour movement goes down the boycott road, the first achievement will indisputably be to destroy upwards of 20,000 jobs. The avalanche of public odium that we would achieve by any such boycott would be well deserved."

The unemployed, employers and the economy need the programme. That is why I say that employment training deserves the unreserved support of Members on both sides of the House.

9.56 pm

Mr. Leighton: I hope that the House will take the view that the Select Committee performed a worthwhile service in allowing the House to debate employment training and that the debate has shed some light on the subject, as well as generating some heat. The Training Commission does not believe that the programme is set in concrete and it will keep it closely under review. When we return to the House after the recess, the programme will already be in operation. I feel sure that the Select Committee will want to monitor and scrutinise the programme closely and to report to the House on its scrutiny. I trust that the House will be able to look again at the issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The Question is, That the motion stands over under the Standing Order.

Mr. Nicholls: I was obviously too generous, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion is stood over until Ten o'clock.

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. I had it in mind that I might fill the vacuum with a few more words of wisdom and peaceful remarks, but if you are saying to me that I am not entitled to do so I shall resume my seat and will allow others to fill it with equally spurious points of order.

If I am entitled to do that, let me assure the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) that I shall look into the specific points that he put to me about programmes in his constituency. We do not intend the community programmes —

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must explain to the Minister that technically the position is that until Ten o'clock we ought to move on to the next item of business, the British Shipbuilders Borrowing Powers (Increase of Limit) Order 1988, but it would be inconvenient to call the Minister to begin his speech on shipbuilding, to interrupt him at Ten o'clock for the House to dispose of the estimates votes and then to return to shipbuilding. It is a difficult and, to me, a unique experience to have this hiatus.

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seems that I could use the few seconds that remain to us to thank you for your guidance to the House——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Minister will put it to me, I shall listen to his point of order.

Mr. Nicholls: The point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I was trying to raise with you——

It being Ten o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to paragraph (5) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of Estimates), to put forthwith the deferred Questions necessary to dispose of the proceedings on Supplementary Estimates, 1988-89 (Class XIV, Vote 1 and Class VII, Vote 5).

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1988-89

CLASS XIV, VOTE 1

Resolved,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding, £538,303,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1989 for expenditure by the Department of Health and Social Security on hospital, community health and related services, including a grant in aid.

CLASS VII, VOTE 5

Resolved,

That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £281,927,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1989 for expenditure by the Department of Employment on a grant aid to the Training Commission (formerly the Manpower Services Commission).

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Question which he was directed to put pursuant to paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 53 (Questions on voting of estimates, &c.).

ESTIMATES 1988-89

Resolved,

That a further sum, not exceeding £57,388,304,000·00, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges for Defence and Civil Services for the year ending on 31st March 1989 as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 256, 329, 339, 510 and 605.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the three foregoing Resolutions and upon the three Resolutions agreed to on 7 July by the Chairman of Ways and Means, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. John Major, Mr. Norman Lamont, Mr. Peter Brooke and Mr. Peter Lilley.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) (NO.2) BILL

Mr. Norman Lamont accordingly presented a Bill to apply a sum out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year ending on 31 March 1989 to appropriate the supplies granted in this Session of Parliament, and to repeal certain Consolidated Fund and Appropriation Acts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed.

Shipbuilding

10.1 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move,

That the draft British Shipbuilders Borrowing Powers (Increase of Limit) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 13th May, be approved.

The order concerns British Shipbuilders' borrowing limit. This is the statutory ceiling on the funds which the corporation may acquire in the form of public dividend capital from the Government, and loans from the commercial market. The order merely gives British Shipbuilders the power to receive the money. It will always be for the House to decide what actually should be made available through the estimates procedure.

The limit presently stands at £1,550 million, as a result of the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Act which received the Royal Assent in July last year. The terms of the 1987 Act enable the borrowing limit to be raised by amounts not exceeding £150 million at a time to £1,800 million, subject to affirmative resolution of this House. I now propose that the borrowing limit be so raised by £150 million to £1,700 million.

I have stated very clearly on a number of occasions in recent weeks that British Shipbuilders has continued to consume alarming sums of money relative to its size. The total now stands at almost £1·8 billion since 1979, while employment is now only 6,261 people. No hon. Member should be surprised to see that the borrowing limit needs to be raised yet again—for the fourth time, I might say, in the last two years. The increase last July amounted to £20,000 per employee. This year's increase amounts to a further £24,000.

Of the £150 million provided by the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Act 1987, around £100 million has been spent so far. British Shipbuilders forecast, that it will need the rest over the summer and early autumn so that, without the approval of this order tonight, there would be a risk to the corporation's ability to continue trading before the next Session of this House. This is the fourth time in the last two years that the House has had to vote extra money to save the business from closing down.

Since the 1987 Act received the Royal Assent, borrowing has been needed for three main reasons. Contract losses have continued to mount. For instance, the first of two ferries for Caledonian MacBrayne built by the Ferguson yard was discovered to be seriously overweight. This is likely to cost the taxpayer around £4 million more than expected on a ship priced at £7 million. None of the corporation's orders has been carried out without contract losses. Secondly, under-recovered overheads have been running at a high rate because of the chronic shortage of orders and work at the yards. Thirdly, the dispute with the customer for the Danish ferries at North East Shipbuilders has meant that no instalment income has been received for many months. British Shipbuilders has had to meet all the building costs itself, although the programme of work has continued. I will touch on that again later.

These and other costs have all required cash, including borrowing from the market and public dividend capital. For the same reasons the corporation will not be able to operate its business within this year's external finance limit of £80 million. The House has been invited to vote a further £74 million as a summer supplementary estimate for British Shipbuilders. The external finance limit will be revised formally once we are clear about disposal possibilities for the remaining facilities and the share of any further costs that the taxpayer will need to cover this financial year.

That history of losses provides the background to my policy for the corporation. We are not selling parts of the business because of some ideological hang-up. We are selling them for sensible commercial reasons. We believe that the parts of shipbuilding that are capable of survival in this country will be managed more efficiently in the private sector, and must face up to market conditions.

I now turn to the programme of disposals that I announced on 18 April when the letter of intent from Kvaerner for its proposed purchase of Govan was received. On 27 June I was delighted to announce the terms that had been agreed with Kvaerner. These have now been notified to the European Commission. I trust that the Commission will accept the terms at its meeting next week, so that the sale can be completed in early August as planned.

Kvaerner offers Govan a future. As British Shipbuilders had not succeeded in attracting other orders beyond the two ships for China agreed early last year, it is plain that the only alternative facing the yard was closure. I look forward to welcoming Kvaerner to these shores. Quite apart from the other business that it intends to bring, there is the prospect of at least one major merchant shipbuilder continuing in Great Britain. As I have said before, my aim now is to discover to what extent it might be possible to return all of British Shipbuilders' yards to private hands. The corporation is nearing the end of its life as a nationalised industry, and there is no realistic prospect of its ever achieving commercial viability in its present form.

It is of course important to stress that we are looking for serious purchasers with sensible business plans and substantial financial backing. We shall sell the parts of the business to substantial interests with a prospect of developing the business for the reasonably foreseeable future. We owe it to the work force and the taxpayer to negotiate on that basis. We are not prepared to facilitate asset-stripping, or to inject large sums of public money into flimsy or speculative ventures. I have to tell the House plainly that I cannot guarantee that we will find credible purchasers or affordable orders and work for every part of the business. My aim is to return every part of the business to the private sector on a basis that is fair to the purchaser, the taxpayer and the work force wherever possible.

British Shipbuilders now expects bids for Appledore from at least two groups interested in continuing merchant shipbuilding at the yard. British Shipbuilders will shortly set a bid date, which I expect to be in early August. As for the other yards, our main objective is to retain merchant shipbuilding as the principal business if that can be achieved on reasonable terms acceptable to ourselves and the European Commission.

Interest has also been expressed in Clark Kincaid and the Ferguson yard at Port Glasgow. I expect British Shipbuilders to set bid dates for those facilities in the near future. There remains considerable interest—I stress the word "considerable"—in Marine Design Consultants at Sunderland and Dundee. I expect bids for MDC will be invited a little later in the programme. In all these cases there will, of course, be delay between the receipt of bids and any request for consent for disposal to allow for negotiations with the parties.

There are, as I have told the House before, a number of parties interested in acquiring all or part of the British Shipbuilders facilities at Sunderland. However, I have to say that they are taking their time in bringing serious propositions to John Lister, the chairman of British Shipbuilders, as the basis for bids. There are naturally important points that need to be discussed in advance of bids on such matters as compliance with the European Community sixth directive and the various qualities that British Shipbuilders would expect to see in an attractive bid.

I am aware that two bidders in particular have made a great deal of their interest in acquiring the business in the press, especially the local press in the north-east. It can only be in the interest of the people of Sunderland if the people who say that they have plans for the yards now come to the table with solid propositions and evidence of financial backing. For that reason, we have to set a definite target for bids to be received for North East Shipbuilders Ltd. in Sunderland. John Lister has agreed to set a final date soon for bids for NESL which will certainly not be later than the end of September.

I am particularly conscious of the uncertainties facing the work force at North East Shipbuilders. I am only too aware of the concern that that is causing to the work force and its families in Sunderland, which is a particularly troubled town at the moment. The House will recall that, apart from its appalling record on losses in recent years, the immediate problem at NESL began with the difficulties that I announced on 18 April between British Shipbuilders and its Danish customer. That dispute still drags on. Meanwhile, British Shipbuilders has cancelled a considerable number of contracts with Mr. Johansen and how has a number of excellent ferries completed in the River Wear and ready to sell. It is making considerable efforts in that direction, but ships take time to sell in today's markets. Meanwhile, inevitable layoffs have already begun at the yard, as was always expected from the moment that the order began if further orders were not attracted into the yard alongside the Danish ferries.

There is also a great deal of interest in the possible order for a series of general cargo ships from Mambisa, the Cuban deep sea shipping company. British Shipbuilders has put in an application for intervention fund support in connection with that order. After careful consideration, I have decided that I cannot offer such support to British Shipbuilders.

As I have said before, my reasons for that are not political or ideological. They are practical and commercial. I am simply not satisfied that British Shipbuilders could build those ships to cost or could do so within the terms of the sixth directive by which we are willingly bound. I have seen no persuasive argument to the contrary, and I have seen a good deal of evidence that supports my view. For instance, the last four ships for Cuba overran their intervention fund support, which was already a considerable cost to the taxpayer, by between 12 and 17 per cent. of cost. If we look back over the history of British Shipbuilders, we see that intervention fund support over the years has cost the taxpayer £250 million. Trading losses on top of that intervention fund support total about £1 billion. Most of us could find more attractive ways of spending £1 billion of public money on one public service or another.

However, I am prepared to consider intervention fund support for the Cuban and other orders from any who may successfully negotiate the purchase of a yard in Sunderland. Such a purchaser would have to accept the risk of contract losses over and above intervention fund support. Any new purchaser or manager would strive to avoid such trading losses. My Department has established that the Cuban company Mambisa has the authority to purchase these ships and to negotiate price and credit terms. One of my officials has been to Cuba to discuss that very matter.

It remains now to be seen whether any of those interested in the yards could negotiate satisfactory terms and they certainly face fierce competition. However, Mambisa has confirmed to my official that it is prepared to allow plenty of time for negotiations to take place.

All this confirms what I told the Select Committee on 28 June. The Cuban order is now a serious opportunity and there never was a June deadline for any contract. However, it is important—so that there is no misapprehension—for people in the north-east to understand that the order is not, and never was, a forgone conclusion. The Cuban order simply is not in the bag or readily available for anybody.

Mambisa is pleased with the ships that it has bought in the past and is happy to order again, but only on competitive terms that are attractive to it, which is, of course, the basis on which any prospective customer would proceed. If the order was won by any British bidder, work would be unlikely to start on the Cuban ships for some months. It could not start this year. The Cuban order, even if it is won, is not, of course, big enough to provide sufficient work to occupy both yards in Sunderland and all their work force. The Cuban ships are not the only ships that prospective purchasers are talking about with British Shipbuilders and my Department.

The situation is extremely difficult and it is important for me to play fair with the people of Sunderland. It would be quite wrong for me to disguise from the House or from the people of Sunderland the fact that there is a very large question mark over the future of the Sunderland yards. We must face up to the fact that there is no clear or certain expectation that any order for any ships can be found for those yards—under any credible ownership of the yards—at acceptable cost.

I have said before that I am not convinced that merchant shipbuilding offers the best future for the town, if it can be sustained only by huge subsidies for occasional orders. The whole business runs the risk of continuing on a hand-to-mouth basis, which is no certain future for the work force and their families. Substantial lay-offs, if not redundancies, are inevitable over the next few months. If no satisfactory bid is forthcoming, I shall in due course announce a package of measures for the town that will be designed to create new opportunities and which will underline all the efforts already being made to secure its economic future. I very much hope that that will not prove necessary, but it is the Government's duty to the people of Sunderland to help them to attract new enterprise and jobs should the need arise.

The order before the House tonight is essentially a technical matter, which is designed to allow British Shipbuilders to continue trading within its statutory trading limit. It is the occasion for a shipbuilding debate in which hon. Members who represent shipbuilding constituencies and other hon. Members who have legitimate interests in shipbuilding may give their views.

British Shipbuilders now has its programme of disposals well in hand. There are inevitable uncertainties. Some facilities may close. However, I hope that in place of a corporation which still makes appalling losses we shall shortly see a merchant shipbuilding industry which is strengthened by these disposals and has a promising future into the 1990s and beyond. I shall make every effort to ensure that we improve the prospects for profitable industrial activity and for secure employment which will last in all the shipbuilding towns.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I had intended to begin my short speech by saying that the Opposition welcomed the order and the fact that at least the borrowing limit is to be raised, which is a sign that the Government do not intend to pull the plug on British Shipbuilders at the moment. However, in the light of the speech that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has just made, that welcome would be quite inappropriate. We have just heard nothing less than the sounding of the death knell of British merchant shipbuilding and, in particular, the death knell for shipbuilding on the Wear. The Chancellor's announcement that he is not prepared to provide intervention fund support in the present circumstances is nothing less than a knife in the back for the workers in Sunderland.

This debate traditionally provides the opportunity for asking questions about the future of the British shipbuilding industry. We have had precious little information from the Chancellor tonight, except for that staggering announcement of his refusal to support the British merchant shipbuilding industry.

We are within a week or so of the House rising for the summer recess. Events of great importance are likely to take place during that recess, and I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to ensure that I and the hon. Members whose constituencies are involved and who have an interest in shipbuilding are kept informed and allowed to question the Chancellor and his Department about each stage of the operation. We need to be able to continue to make the case for British merchant shipbuilding over that period, as it has certainly not been made by Conservative Members.

I was going to express a welcome for this order, but I was not going to welcome the reasons for extending the borrowing limit. They lie in the uncertainty, delay and confusion that have arisen because of the Government's attitude to the decisions they have to take. Because the future, particularly in Sunderland, is so unclear and, in the light of the Chancellor's speech, so gloomy, costs are rising, workers are being laid off and losses are sure to mount. Because of all that, British Shipbuilders continues to need the increase in borrowing limits for which the order provides.

The Chancellor had the opportunity this evening to provide the House and the industry with information on which the industry could base some sort of future and make better plans to reduce the inevitable haemorrhage of costs that will occur over the next few months. Instead, I fear that the industry will be left with no incentive except to bear the losses as they happen and to look forward to a future without hope.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned the future for Govan. It has a future of a sort in the hands of Kvaerner, and subject to the permission of the Commission it has a future with the intervention fund subsidy that is available. But it is reasonable to ask why it was necessary to give the yard away if the subsidy approved by the intervention fund is to be continued. That is an instance of the ideology that the Chancellor denies is at work.

We also heard some cryptic remarks about the future of Appledore Ferguson and Clark Kincaid. We were told that British Shipbuilders was setting bid dates. It should be put firmly on the record that British Shipbuilders is not taking the initiative in this respect. To the extent that John Lister and others are setting bid dates, they are doing so under the direction of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The most pressing question arises not in respect of Govan, Appledore Ferguson or Clark Kincaid but—it was clear from the Chancellor's speech—in respect of North East Shipbuilders Ltd. Layoffs are already taking place and by Christmas no more than 200 men will be left on the site. By early in the new year the yard will have no more work and will close unless orders are secured. It is essential to the future of British merchant shipbuilding that the yard's future should be secured. It is surely common ground among all who care for the future of the industry —that must include the Chancellor—that the future of the yard depends on securing orders, not on the form of ownership.

Orders are the lifeline for NESL. The overwhelming priority for any Government, Minister or person concerned with the future of the yard must be to secure orders to keep it and the industry alive. The Government have their priorities wrong; they deny their commitment to ideology, but say that ownership must be established first, and only then can orders be examined. It is that order of priorities that threatens the survival of the industry.

The yard desperately needs orders. An order—subject, I agree, to the factors that the Chancellor mentioned—is available. One crucial precondition to the securing of that order is that intervention fund support should be made available. The Chancellor had an opportunity tonight to make it clear that, if British Shipbuilders, NESL, could reach agreement on price and could raise the necessary financial support—I will come to that in a moment—the difficulty that might arise in the absence of intervention support might be removed, the yard would be encouraged and helped to secure the order, and only then would the Government insist, if they wished, on sorting out ownership.

It is the Government who have reversed that order of priorities and insisted for reasons of no validity—reasons which rest entirely on their own dogma—that the order should take second place to ownership.

It is not as though the Chancellor's arguments bear any real examination. First, the doctrine peddled by the Chancellor speak very little for his confidence in the new management that he appointed only a year or so ago. I believe that he should have come to the House tonight to express some confidence in the new management, which has recognised the problems facing British Shipbuilders, especially the yard in Sunderland, which has taken great steps, with the co-operation of the work force, to get matters right. The Chancellor has expressed a substantial, if not fatal, vote of no confidence in both management and work force.

Secondly, the Chancellor bases his argument on the need to ensure—as he puts it—that contract losses, if they arise, will be borne not by the taxpayer, but by a new private owner. Even on the Chancellor's terms, that argument does not stand up. I do not believe that the case for the inevitability of contract losses has been made. If the Chancellor is simply making that assumption, it amounts to a tremendous vote of no confidence in the yard and its management.

I shall assume for the moment that the Chancellor was right in saying that, if the Cuban order were obtained and intervention fund support provided, there would still be contract losses, but there is no escape by selling to a private owner. No private owner worth his negotiating salt would sit at the opposite end of the table and ignore that factor when deciding what price to pay or, far more likely, what sum to demand to take the yard away. The taxpayer will pick up the bill for contract losses, irrespective of whether the yard remains in public ownership. Ownership is irrelevant to contract losses; as it is irrelevant to securing the orders and to the survival of the yard. It is the Government's dogma alone that makes ownership relevant at all.

There are real questions to be asked and answered. Unfortunately, in a remarkably uninformative speech, the Chancellor has provided little information on any of those real questions. On the Danish ferry contract, we have had no indication from the Chancellor of what the legal position was, how the negotiations were proceeding, what the Export Credits Guarantee Department's attitude was, what would happen if Johansen finally defaulted, and what that would mean for the work programme on the remaining ferries? We have no information on that, which is extremely disappointing.

What about the Cuban order? As I have said, that is the one remaining realistic prospect for keeping the yard open. The Cuban order was denied as a possibility for months by the Chancellor. It was only when the yard and its management insisted that it was a real possibility that the Chancellor deigned to take it seriously.

There was also a question about the application for intervention fund support. British Shipbuilders wrote expressing considerable interest in the order, referring to the price it thought that it would bid and the amount of intervention fund it would need. However, the Chancellor's Department told British Shipbuilders that help would be very unlikely. When it raised again and in public the need for intervention fund support, it was rebuffed with the excuse that no application had been made. That kind of double dealing epitomises the lack of support and interest that the Government have shown in securing the Cuban order.

However, at least a senior civil servant has now been to Cuba and presumably has entered into serious negotiations. We hope that he has come back from Havana with some serious propositions. Again, we heard very little information about that from the Chancellor tonight.

Will the Chancellor confirm that he believes that the Cuban order is a real possibility? Will he also confirm that British Shipbuilders—subject, I agree, to foreign competition—can bid successfully for the order? Will he further agree that with intervention fund support and a level of financial support in a package—which we, above all, must be able to organise in the City of London in the form of a package that will at least match that available from other supplying countries such as Spain—the Cuban order would be available and would save the yard? That is what we had hoped to hear this evening from the Chancellor. Instead we heard the sound of the slamming of the door.

If the Government insist on their ideological obsessions and on selling the yard before they consider support for the order, there are still real questions which the Chancellor has not deigned to answer. How many bidders have we had? How many are serious? How many of them would keep the yard going as an entity? How many intend to split up the yard, retaining only such bits as design capacity? What are the deadlines? Is there a serious prospect of the Copson bid or order materialising? If it materialises, what are the plans to bridge the gap that would inevitably arise? All those are real and practical questions, the answers to which will determine the fate of thousands of jobs and of this vital yard and part of the British merchant shipbuilding industry.

We have had no answers from the Chancellor to those important questions. I am left with welcoming the order. However, I suspect that the increase in borrowing powers is itself a poisoned chalice and that this is not an act of generosity, but something that will be hung around the neck of British Shipbuilders in future as further evidence of how unsustainable it was. Time and again we hear the figures trotted out about how much public money is being devoted to the industry. The Chancellor has conceded in earlier comments that large proportions of that money have gone to warship yards that have since been privatised and to restructuring and causes other than trading losses. I hope that these further sums will not be added into that quite unfair and misleading total.

As the Chancellor is aware, I recently visited Sunderland and the two yards on the Wear. I was impressed, as any visitor would be, by the evidence of the taxpayers' investment and by the immense facilities available to the yards. I was also impressed by the keenness and realism of the management and the tremendous efforts made by the work force, which has suffered grievously in terms of job losses in recent years. I formed a very high opinion of the efforts made in those yards to sustain a future that is so important to British industry.

I am sorry to hear tonight that the Chancellor does not share that enthusiasm. No one discounts the difficulties involved, but I had hoped that the Chancellor would reaffirm his commitment to British merchant shipbuilding and NESL. Sadly, we did not hear that reaffirmation tonight.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): The size of the borrowings revealed to the House by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor is perhaps not a shock—the seriousness of the position has been rehearsed on many occasions over a long time—but it shows that we are indeed in a crisis and cannot just accept a continuation of the previous scene. I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend that action is needed.

My right hon. and learned Friend will understand the concern in the north-east about the fate of Sunderland Shipbuilders. He is, I know, aware that this is regarded as a regional problem not just of concern to all parties on Wearside but in the wider area.

Enormous efforts have successfully been made to modernise the local industry and provide alternative employment prospects on Wearside. My right hon. and learned Friend cannot, however, be ignorant of the serious unemployment problem in Sunderland. We must do all we can to seek to ensure a future for the town's shipyards.

There are signs of a changing world scene for shipping. It would not be right to say that the sun is rising and that there are rosy prospects, but ship demand is growing. There are signs that the era of cut-throat competition, which depressed prices and led to dramatic borrowing to cover British Shipbuilders' losses over many years or more, is easing. Prices are rising, and our main competitors in the far east are experiencing problems. The Japanese are suffering from the high yen. When I visited Japan earlier this year with a Select Committee, I was interested to note the difficulties that the Japanese are experiencing with all their exports because of the strength of the yen. For the first time, Korea is experiencing industrial relations problems. Demands are being acceded to for very large wage rises. These eastern competitors will not have the easy time that they had in the past.

The shipbuilding recession is an international problem and the House has rehearsed the problems many times over the 13 years of the recession. On many occasions, I have drawn attention to the need for international action. At last, there are signs of that happening. Discussions are now under way between the Japanese and the EEC to seek to establish some stability in the shipbuilding market.

I have referred to the concern on Wearside and in the north-east, but the reduction in capacity has a far wider knock-on effect on the engineering industry. The House is aware that I have been involved with the marine equipment industry for a long time. Twice as many jobs are involved in the manufacture of parts of ships as in assembly in the shipyards. Those jobs are nationwide, not only on Wearside.

Inevitably, there is much uncertainty on Wearside about the future of Sunderland Shipbuilders. However much we should like him to, I understand why my right hon. and learned Friend cannot reveal details of any discussions with potential purchasers of the yard or discussions with the Cubans or other potential purchasers of ships. Will he, however, undertake that any information about potential orders from Cuba or other shipowners will be made available to a potential purchaser of the yard so that the potential purchaser will know the state of any negotiations?

Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider the possibility of the two sites in Sunderland being converted into private ownership separately? I remind him that at one time they were two separate businesses before British Shipbuilders came into being. Will he give way on the end of September deadline if serious negotiations are in progress at the time? If by then there is a serious possibility of either site—or both sites—in Sunderland being transferred to a purchaser, will he undertake to extend the deadline?

One must accept that one cannot go on building ships at 45 or 50 per cent. losses. It is a measure of the Government's support for the industry that they are prepared to continue the intervention fund at 28 per cent. A 28 per cent. subsidy on future merchant orders will be available to any purchaser of the Sunderland yard and my right hon. and learned Friend should spell out that fact. I ask him to understand the wide concern in the north-east about the future of the industry, and I hope that he can give the House some assurances on my specific points.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): I endorse the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) about the Minister's speech. It was even more dreary, pessimistic and disappointing than I expected it to be. Some of his remarks were positively damaging to any prospect of the privatisation of NESL on which he is so bent. Any potential purchaser who took much notice of his speech would immediately be put off.

The Minister has created an absolutely hopeless mess for the future of NESL, because of his ideological obsession with privatisation first and, perhaps, orders later. That point can be illustrated in a pragmatic way. On many occasions, the Minister himself has acknowledged that the Cuban order is a serious possibility. He acknowledged that point tonight, despite saying that he was not prepared to give intervention fund assistance for it at the moment. That statement is to be welcomed, compared with his remarks earlier in the year that the order did not exist at all.

Having acknowledged it as a serious possibility, the Minister must surely accept that any immediate purchaser of NESL—a purchaser on whom he is insisting—will have to clinch the Cuban order, unless there are so many orders around the world at the moment that each potential purchaser can come along with different prospects. If that is the case, the scenario is different from the one that has continually been painted in debates over the past few years, when we were told that there were no orders in the world.

The Minister acknowledges that the Cuban order is essential. Some other things can be exciting in the longer term, but they will not happen unless the gap, or some of it, is filled by the Mambisa order in the near future.

I do not understand how the Minister has the audacity to talk about potential purchasers taking their time. Only a few weeks ago, he announced his determination to privatise NESL. Some people—one or two—have been seriously working night and day, putting other matters aside, to try to put together a package that will save the yard. If one is trying to put together a bid, I can hardly believe that it is helpful not even to know what the bid deadline is or what is happening with the Cuban order. It is a chicken and egg situation. How does one put together a business plan for NESL when one does not know what is happening with the Cuban order? How does one hope to secure the Cuban order when the Cubans do not even know with what ownership they are placing the order?

It is ridiculous for the Minister to say that people are taking their time. Some of the people who are not taking their time, other than the one or two serious potential bidders, are the growing number of sharks, charlatans and comedians who are coming on to the scene and, looking at the pickings. That is ridiculous when we are talking about 12 to 15 potential purchasers. It is so ridiculous that, I suppose, I could walk out of the Chamber and announce that I am to put in a bid for NESL, and my name would go on the list. Anyone can walk in off the street, ring up the Department of Trade and Industry, and another joker will be put on the list as a potential bidder. That is the ridiculous situation that has been created.

Men have been laid off and will be laid off in their hundreds in the next few weeks—that affects their families—but they do not even know the names of the potential bidders—the "blue tornado" and the rest of the jokers. The men do not even know whether this measure will provide them with some future security. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has created that situation by his insistence on privatisation before anything else can happen.

Let us look at the outcome. From a pragmatic point of view, the position is ludicrous. There are only one or two serious prospects. As an example I shall take Mr. Zacchi and his consortium, which seems serious about wanting to secure the Mambisa order. We can also take as an example Mr. Copson and his bucket boats, which is a more long-term proposition. How does it help fitting together those different propositions and working out whether things can be built and outfitted in Pallion, Southwick or North Sands and how the facilities could fit together in a way that would maximise them when those people are, in effect, having to bid against each other and against a deadline that they do not even know?

Apart from the Minister's blank refusal, which I suppose was not that unexpected, there was the appalling announcement that in no way will there be intervention fund aid without privatisation. The other appalling development was his announcement that the bid deadline might not be until the end of September. As he knows, there will be hundreds more redundancies by them. If the Minister allows the damaging uncertainty to continue until that time—when there are people who, if he would only clarify the position, could start talking seriously about bids in the next few days—the position becomes even more damaging than we thought.

In conclusion, the Minister has created a mess and it is his responsibility to get out of the mess. There is a way out of it. If one puts ideology aside, the common-sense way to proceed is to say, "We have one or two potentially serious possibilities—the Cuban order, Mr. Copson and one or two others—and the job with which we should now get on is clinching the Cuban order, doing the work on Mr. Copson's proposition and talking about the one or two other potential orders. Let's leave NESL as it is at the moment to get on with that job."

When those orders have been clinched when we know whether Mr. Copson can build his bucket boats and whether he can get a licence and overcome some of the other hurdles facing him, and when the NESL's existing management who, at the top level, from the chairman down to the managing director, are one of the best managements in British Shipbuilders for a long time and who are supremely qualified to work out the practicalities of building those ships and arranging cycles and time scales to save the greatest number of jobs—when all that has been done, if the Minister must, we can then debate the privatisation of what has been achieved. That is the logical way to proceed.

If the Minister does not do that, this debate may mark the final announcement of a malicious and unnecessary sabotage of the largest remaining part of the British merchant shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a brief contribution to the debate, because the decline of shipbuilding in this country has a significance which should not elude British industry as a whole and which is worth emphasising.

I am not suggesting that there is any great significance in the motion to increase the statutory limit up to which British Shipbuilders can raise additional public dividend capital or raise commercial loans. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has explained his object in that regard and what he has told the House that British Shipbuilders requires is analagous to a private company seeking to increase its authorised but unissued share capital or to raise the borrowing powers in its memoranda and articles of association.

What matters in any enterprise is the reason for which that additional finance is contemplated. The sound reason is to fund expansion beyond the scope of any current earnings and cash flow. The less happy reason which applies in the case of British Shipbuilders is to enable a company to accommodate the effect of cumulative losses, to cover the cost of cuts which managers euphemistically describe as "rationalisation" and to cover the cost of redundancies without breaching statutory limits.

Not surprisingly for British Shipbuilders, this evening's order comes after a decade of huge losses. The industry has struggled with the massive problems of over-capacity throughout the world, cut-throat competition, spectacular changes in marine technology and production methods in the shipyards. As such things had an effect, it must be said that British shipbuilding labour has all too often shown itself to be poignantly ignorant of the vital need to be flexible on matters such as demarcation and of the need for greater productivity.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): That is not true.

Mr. Wardle: I am not saying that there has been no progress, but there has not been enough. There is no question but that our labour has priced itself way beyond the competition offered by far eastern shipbuilders.

The sad story of Britain's shipbuilding decline from 80 per cent. of the world market to one third of the virtual captive market that existed during the rebuilding boom of the late 1940s and early 1950s and down to our present minute and paltry share of the market is a well-documented case study of industrial decline, upon which I shall not dwell.

The last chapter of that case study was the ill-judged nationalisation that scraped through in 1977. In the past decade, that has resulted in the massive drain of £2 billion of taxpayers' money. The purpose of that support has been to preserve the jobs of a few workers and—rightly perhaps —to sustain the shipbuilding communities. It might have been kinder if, long ago, the attention of such communities had been turned to other products, fresh markets, new enterprise and a renewed sense of determination.

No amount of taxpayers' money, grants or subsidies will turn the industrial clock back. It is sad that Opposition Members cannot accept that and cannot accept its significance for Britain's industry. No amount of subsidy will halt the inevitable progress of change. [Interruption.] Opposition Members may shout as much as they like, but it will not. The harsh fact of life that must be faced is that competition is here to stay. There are cheaper and more flexible sources of labour, and sophisticated technology and cheaper raw materials at the disposal of shipbuilders in Japan and—more worrying for our industry—in South Korea.

British Shipbuilders undertakes a production task whereby two thirds of the product cost is bought in and one third is open to management and employee control. That is not a basis on which our yards can compete with the far east.

The problems are not unique to shipbuilding; industrial change is taking place everywhere. In the early 1980s, countless firms in the black country faced a similar acute problem of over-capacity in world markets. Those companies had priced themselves out of the market as a result of wage-driven inflation.

Mr. Gould: What?

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) may express surprise, but I worked in that part of the world and saw examples of the good times and the bad. I saw the problems and I have witnessed the resurgence. There is a lesson to be learned by the shipbuilding industry. The sooner Opposition Members grasp the import of that lesson and encourage the shipbuilding communities to understand it, the sooner prosperity will return to those yards.

Mr. Gould: I have borne the hon. Gentleman's outrageous lecture with equanimity for some time, but will he estimate a guess as to the importance and relevance of the 60 per cent. increase in the real exchange rate, brought about by an excessively tight monetary policy perpetrated by his Government, to the problems experienced by British industry in the period he mentioned, and especially industry in the black country?

Mr. Wardle: It was undoubtedly a factor, along with the increase in oil prices in the 1970s. I recommend that the hon. Gentleman looks at the comments of his colleagues and the level of unemployment that they were predicting in the late 1970s before this Government came to power.

Wherever industrial change has been accepted as a challenge, and wherever the hankering after yesterday's markets has stopped, industrial and commercial resurgence has already begun, with new technologies and new opportunities to exploit. I hope that the British shipbuilding industry will grasp that vital lesson.

We have heard all about the resourceful and wholly commendable initiatives taken by the Government to provide subsidies for the possible Danish and Cuban orders and latterly to find suitable buyers. We have heard about Govan and Kvaerner and the initiatives taken towards Appledore and Ferguson, but, so far as the Wear and North-East Shipbuilders are concerned, the harsh reality of market competition must be faced. There will always be pockets of specialist shipbuilding enterprise in this country, but, on the Wear, we should not perpetuate a long-gone past, but create a new and prosperous future.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): The speech to which we have just listened has been a complete waste of time in this short debate which is taking place at a disgracefully late hour about an important industry. I shall cut my remarks short and just make one or two comments about Govan shipyard.

The way in which Sunderland has been treated is outrageous. The Minister's speech, far from being helpful to the prospect of privatisation and the prospect of obtaining the orders that Sunderland desperately needs, has been extremely unhelpful and damaging. Sunderland has been treated in an utterly disgraceful way.

The deal concerning Govan has gone through, subject to the European Commission's approval. Although I have expressed my views on privatisation on a number of occasions, I have to accept that the privatisation of Govan will now go ahead. It is not an unmixed blessing, even with the orders that are coming to Govan, because 500 redundancies will accompany them. So far as making the yard profitable is concerned, it helps if one obtains the yard for nothing, all the assets, plant and machinery are written down to nil in the 1986-87 British Shipbuilders' accounts and if all the losses and any prospective losses on the orders in the yards at the time are borne by British Shipbuilders and, ultimately, by the taxpayer. Kvaerner is getting an extremely favourable deal at Govan, but I wish the company well at the yard because the interests of my constituents who work there are bound up with the success of the yard.

I want to ask about intervention fund support in the long term. It was announced in a written answer on 27 June that the two gas-carrying ships which are definitely to be ordered at Govan are to have intervention fund support and the two other possible orders will also be eligible. The sixth directive was meant to last for five years and we are only 18 months into it. The Government have already reneged on the directive, as they are not making support available to British Shipbuilders so long as the company remains publicly owned.

I hope that the Minister will tell us about the longer-term prospects of the sixth difective, both in Govan and elsewhere. It was intended to last for five years and there has already been a considerable resiling on that by the Government. Those hon. Members who still have shipbuilding interests are entitled to ask the Minister to tell us something this evening about the longer-term future of the sixth directive and intervention fund support. I should like to say much more, but I know that hon. Friends with constituency interests are anxious to be called.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): The shipyard in my constituency is important to its economy. If the shipyard in Appledore were to be closed, or turned into a marina or a block of luxury flats, there is no way in which 520 jobs could be found for 520 very skilled people. I feel confident that privatisation will not lead to the closing of the yard.

I am puzzled by the unpleasant tone of some of the Opposition speeches. I appreciate that my shipyard, if I may use that familiar phrase, is different. At least half the men on the shop floor welcome privatisation. There is an exceptionally good relationship between management and men. The management, the men and I have had no difficulty in discovering who will be putting forward the bids. Would-be bidders have approached me and have asked to meet me. John Lister, the chairman of British Shipbuilders, has fobbed me off over making a closer link, sooner than he wishes, between the prospective purchasers and the men on the shop floor.

The Minister welcomed a large delegation from the yard to his office only last week. It was an immensely helpful and successful meeting. Of course he was unable to tell the men everything that they wanted to know. Commercial constraints mean, quite properly, that until bids are on the table, commercially sensitive information cannot be released. Everything cannot be put on the table during union and management negotiations when a prospective purchaser is being tempted to buy.

The yard has a good order book and a good future. There are no worries about far eastern labour, because nobody else makes such splendid little ships—dredgers—as Appledore Ferguson. The yard has made tremendous advances in the use of modern technology, with beautiful computer-aided design. It has already led to great advantages.

The fears and concerns that have been expressed more inelegantly than Opposition Members may realise will not be justified in the long run. Privatisation will lead to more jobs and to the expansion that the dead, cold hand of the state could never achieve.

11.2 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): You will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I err slightly on the inelegant side, too, but I must outline the consequences of the shattering blow that this state of affairs represents for my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay). Sunderland was built on shipbuilding. Well within the memory of many of the people who live and work there today, Sunderland was once the largest shipbuilding town in the world. Male unemployment now stands well in excess of 20 per cent. In some areas there are whole streets where hardly anyone has a job. A generation of children is growing up who may never have any work, except that provided by a Government scheme. If the Minister and hon. Members detect just a little anger on this side of the House, I have given him the reason for it.

I must knock on the head a couple of falsehoods that were lobbed in by the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle). He referred to workers pricing themselves out of jobs. The workers in the Wearside shipyards take home on average £110 a week. Their gross pay is between £145 and £160, depending on their grade. It is outrageous for the hon. Gentleman to talk in those terms. They are merely an illustration of his ignorance.

The hon. Member spoke about the need for flexibility and claimed that there had been demarcation problems, although I was interested to note that the Minister did not make such an allegation. Indeed, anybody with a knowledge of the industry would avoid making such an allegation because the workers in Sunderland have been extremely flexible. As one of them put it the other day, they have seen more changes than the traffic lights in Fawcett street. They have bent over backwards to make their industry viable. There is no sacrifice that they have not been prepared to make.

It has not been pointed out clearly enough just how much what has occurred has been in direct contradiction to the advice of the management of British Shipbuilders. Mr. Lister, the widely respected chairman, who was appointed just over a year ago by the Government, has left nobody in any doubt about his view of the situation. When he appeared before the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on 14 June, he was asked by my hon. Friend the

> "Did you think when you were appointed last year to be chairman that you were going to be presiding over the fragmentation of your corporation within the year?
> A: I would not have joined if I had thought that for a moment. I thought that my job was to turn it round and make it viable. After six months I believed I could see a way to do that, or I would never have come.
> Q: So, as an experienced businessman, you can see that, in keeping the corporation together in its present form, whether publicly owned or not, it would have a future?
> A: Yes."

Later, Mr. Lister said in answer to a question from the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter):

> "In my view, if you took one yard out of British Shipbuilders it would not be able to exist in the form that it is . . . we would not be able to sustain the research and technical effort at the level that is necessary.
> Q: Have you advanced that view to the Department of Trade and Industry?
> A: Yes, I have.
> Q: With what response?
> A: I think they accepted it.
> Q: Did they indicate what they were going to do about it?
> A: Their response was to suggest that we would sell Govan to Kvaerner.
> Q: I do not see the logical connection between the view you have expressed and the sale of the yard.
> A: Neither do I."

What is occurring is happening in the teeth of the interests of the work force, without regard to the social consequences and in defiance of the view of the management appointed by the Government. If there is some bitterness in Sunderland, it is due to a feeling—the Minister used the phrase "ideological hang-up" and perhaps that best describes it—that this is privatisation at all costs.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North in saying that we should do our best to obtain the Cuban order and then discuss the form of ownership. The workers in Sunderland are practical people. Unlike some Members here, they dwell firmly in the real world. They have done their best to preserve their industry and the generations of skills that have been accumulated. As I say, let us get the order and then argue about the method of ownership.

11.8 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The hon. Member for Devon, West and Torridge (Miss Nicholson) kindly referred to the joint interest that we have in Appledore Ferguson. I understand that she is to visit the Newark yard in Port Glasgow in my constituency at the beginning of August. Hugh Hagen, the convener of the shop stewards' committee, informed me this evening that he is looking forward to her visit.

Miss Emma Nicholson rose——

Dr. Godman: I do not have time to give way. This is too serious a matter for many hundreds of families in my constituency.

My hon. Friends and I must be brutally realistic over this matter. We must ignore the Minister's professions of ideological innocence. The Government are getting rid of what is left of British Shipbuilders. That is accepted by the shop stewards and employees at Clark Kincaid and at the Newark yard of Appledore Ferguson. It is now received wisdom. The Minister spoke of serious purchasers with sensible business plans, and I should like to speak about both facilities. Clark Kincaid is the only marine engine builder left on the Clyde. It is now building an excellent work force, entirely unlike that described by the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle)—a speech characterised in some respects by its insensitivity and stupidity. If our workers are paid so highly, why has Kvaerner come to Glasgow?

Clark Kincaid is building two engines for Chinese ships which are under construction at Govan. As I have told the Minister before, the Chinese superintendent engineers are delighted with the quality of the workmanship of the first engine, which has been test-run for scores of hours. Clark Kincaid would, I believe, become a much more attractive prospect to serious purchasers if Kvaerner would give us some indication that it would purchase the engines for the liquid petroleum gas carriers from the lower Clyde. I for one do not believe that the intervention fund money should be used to purchase equipment that is to go into a ship from outwith the European Community. Statistics from the Department of Trade and Industry prove that more than 90 engines for ships built in European Community shipyards—I see that the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) agrees with me—have come from engine builders outwith the EEC. In my view, that was not and is not the purpose of the intervention fund principle.

As I have said to Kvaerner, it could display plainly its commitment to the west of Scotland by placing orders with Clark Kincaid, which in my naturally biased view is among the best engine builders in Western Europe. When a replacement was built in the north-east for the Atlantic Conveyor, which was sunk in the Falkland conflict, the engine was built by Clark Kincaid. Cunard's technical director sent a letter saying that he had not encountered that quality of workmanship before. When the Atlantic Conveyor was extended at Scott Lithgow in my constituency, the superintendent engineer at Cunard told me, "This engine is a superb product of which the whole of Scotland can be proud."

If Kvaerner places those engine orders with Clark Kincaid, it will make it a much more attractive prospect to a would-be buyer. I hope that considerable sympathy will be shown to the management buy-out proposals. Those involved know the lower Clyde and are trusted and respected by the committee of shop stewards, who, led by councillor Robert Jackson, are demanding—rightly, in my opinion—that they be allowed to talk to the would-be purchasers. Is British Shipbuilders denying that facility to these highly experienced, mature and wise shop stewards? If so, it is a disgrace. They are a credit to the members they represent, and they will negotiate sensibly and realistically with a serious would-be purchaser.

Ferguson's—the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West will have to forgive me; to me it will always be Ferguson's of Port Glasgow—has been mentioned in that august journal the Greenock Telegraph, known to my Scottish colleagues and of course the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). Last night's editorial stated:

> "Appledore Ferguson is our one remaining shipyard. Whatever happens, they must not be sold down the river. British Shipbuilders must make sure that they find a buyer who can give reasonable guarantees about the future of this excellent little yard."

That is precisely what it is—an "excellent little yard". Despite what the Minister said about the recent error on the Caledonian MacBrayne ferry, that remains the fact. The error was the responsibility of the designer, as he knows. It had nothing to do with the work force, which is entirely blameless in that regard. The designers who committed the error have parted company with British Shipbuilders.

Appledore Ferguson is a first-class little yard. The shop stewards and the convener, Hugh Hagen, should be given the facility to speak to would-be purchasers. I believe that Ailsa Perth of Troon is a serious would-be purchaser with sensible business plans. I wish to hear from the Minister that the board of British Shipbuilders will give every facility to Hughie Hagen and his colleagues to meet would-be purchasers, whether they are from Ailsa Perth or elsewhere. That is what I am seeking for my constituents who work at Clark Kincaid and Ferguson.

As everyone here knows, when a company is acquired, the work force is acquired with it. That is a fact to which the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West alluded. Incidentally, I hope to visit the shipyard in her constituency at the beginning of September, with her agreement. It would be difficult to refuse to do so, given that I accepted her visit to my constituency.

I wish to ensure that the shop stewards at Clark Kincaid and Ferguson—they are fine, decent, honourable men, whom it is a privilege to represent—are not barred from talking to would-be purchasers. After all, they will be purchased along with the material facilities in the yards. I want to see both yards continue, although it looks as if that will be under private ownership. I want the best deal possible for my constituents at Clark Kincaid and Ferguson in Port Glasgow.

11.18 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): We have had the opportunity to hear a little industrial rubbish from the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle), who does not speak much in the Chamber. Having listened to him, I can understand why that is. We have heard "I'm all right, Joe" from the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). The Minister gave us a homily on borrowing powers, which amounted to the ability of British Shipbuilders to borrow its own death grant.

This is the death knell of British Shipbuilders. The Minister comes to bury it and I come to praise it. It has done a superb job in concentrating the industry, in keeping it going and ensuring that it can survive to inherit the turnaround in shipbuilding that will come in the 1990s, in which we need to be an active player. Thanks to the Minister's policies, we shall not be. Having done all that, British Shipbuilders is being sabotaged by the Minister. He is normally the genial face of industrial incompetence, but tonight he was the shamed face of industrial murder. It is no wonder that he had such a miserable and unhappy expression throughout the debate, bearing in mind the news that he brought. He was telling us about industrial murder.

A hole was knocked in British Shipbuilders by taking out the defence yards, so that they made no contribution to the whole. The idea that obsessed the Minister earlier in the year was the giveaway of Govan, which was 40 per cent. of BS's capacity. I shall not repeat my Victor Kyam joke that the giveaway is such an obsession that when it comes to Harland and Wolff, which is not part of British Shipbuilders, the Government are not bothering to check whether Mr. Tikkoo, who is presumably a Hindu, is a Protestant Hindu or a Catholic Hindu, before he is given the yard.

We are seeing the dismantling of British Shipbuilders. The Minister has told us that what is not sold will be scrapped, closed, sunk, made redundant or ended. That was his message. It was also the message that he gave to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry. He said:

"I rather think there won't be any yards in the ownership of British Shipbuilders in 12 months' time."

Can there be a more incompetent way of dealing even with the dismantling of British Shipbuilders? Is not that an invitation to every shark and to every crook—to all those strange creatures which swarm in these waters—to come in and take the pickings? Is not that treating British Shipbuilders like a rummage yard to be picked over? Is not the Minister saying to anyone who wants, "Come in. There are bargains here. There are profits for the asking"? Is he not saying to anyone who might place orders with British Shipbuilders, "Hold on to your orders. You'll get better terms and a better deal. You'll even get the yard"? Is not that incompetence?

What swindler in the City would announce that the company was to go within a year whatever happened and then, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman has done tonight, start knocking the goods and saying that they are not up to the job—that the vessels that the yards produce are not adequate for the purposes for which they are intended? What kind of industrial performance is that? What confidence does it show in British shipbuilding and in the industrial future of Britain?

The Minister compounds his asinine attitude to the sale of a national asset with dogma, particularly on the question of NESL. He has told us that the Government will not consider giving help—the kind of help that every other Government would give their shipbuilders. The Government will not consider helping NESL to win the Cuban contract. The Cubans want those ships, which are of a good basic Austin and Pickersgill design. All other Governments will provide help and say, "We shall build up a package and help with the financing." The Chancellor of the Duchy, on the other hand, has told us that the Government will not do that unless the yard is sold first, they will not do it if the yard remains publicly owned.

Effectively, that is the death knell of the shipyard. The lay-offs have already begun: by the end of August there will be about 370 lay-offs; by September, 600 to 700 lay-offs; by Christmas, there will be only a couple of hundred people left, and by February next year the yard will run out of work. The Minister has said that that yard must now twist in the wind while the agony of finding a buyer who can take on the Cuban contract continues. He should have been saying, "We will provide the help to get that contract for British Shipbuilders to keep the yard going and to keep the jobs in being." All that he has promised tonight is a little industrial mortician operation when the yard is closed. I am surprised that he did not promise the area a garden festival, as garden festivals have been passed round British industrial areas like wreaths under this Government.

It is a bitterly frustrating job being in Opposition and having to watch such industrial incompetence and sabotage going on. We are having to watch mistakes being made and the Government ruining a great British industry. We cannot stop it happening. The Government have the votes. We cannot argue against it, because sheer prejudice from the top—from No. 10 Downing street—is forcing this treatment on a British industry. What we can do is to pin the blame for the sabotage of the industry right where it belongs—on the Government, on the Minister and on his Department—the Department of Trade and Industry reduction and industrial sabotage. They are responsible for sounding the death knell for North East Shipbuilders Ltd. and for British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has a racy turn of phrase which usually enlivens our debates, but I think that his flair for light entertainment is a little ill-placed in this extremely serious and important debate about the future of British shipbuilding. The hon. Gentleman added to the attacks on my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle), the one hon. Member to whom I do not need to reply.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Minister agrees with him.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with 90 per cent. of what my hon. Friend said. Unlike the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, unlike me, and unlike any other hon. Member who has spoken in the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle has considerable experience of running a business in difficult trading conditions—and successfully. He spoke a great deal of business common sense in the face of a lot of completely hopeless wishful thinking and irresponsible financial suggestions from the Opposition.

Unfortunately, it is important that we make things clear to the people who are so worried in the shipbuilding towns. Several times I was accused of not being sufficiently informative. I was only too informative. I was probably looking serious and grave because I was setting the facts before the House, as everyone should know them. As my hon. Friends the Members for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) and for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) acknowledged, I had to hold back commercially confidential information. I will not give details of people who might be customers or purchasers and who do not want details about them to be disclosed. That would sabotage the outcome that hon. Members have said they want. I put forward the position as clearly and fairly as I could to the House. The only sensible way of proceeding is that which I set out.

[Mr. Clarke]

I begin with the one yard that has a secure future—Govan—as a result of the policy that we have followed. The Opposition attacked the arrangements for Govan, on the absurd basis that we have somehow given away that asset to a Norwegian company. Of course, we have had to cover the cost of the losses on finishing the Chinese orders. Of course, we had to cover the cost of redundancies which were not the responsibility of Kvaerner, and we have made arrangements that I believe satisfy the Commission rules. They are prudent; they do not write off debt; they are fair arrangements that give that company a future. We have also complied with the sixth directive, to which I shall return.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) made it sound as though the sixth directive forces Governments to give up to a certain level of aid. That is wrong: it does not. Other European countries do not give aid, but there is a limit if they do. We readily accept that to ensure fair trading within the sixth directive, with which we have complied.

For the future, we have made it clear to Kvaerner that, within the rules that appertain at the time, intervention fund support would be available for orders by Kvaerner. If the four ships are ordered, Govan has a work load well into the 1990s. The alternative was closure. Our policy has been successful in Govan, so it was absurd to attack what has happened there——

Mr. Millan rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman, as he is the least troubled Member in the Chamber, since Govan is safe into the 1990s, subject only to the approval of the European Commission, which I hope we shall get tomorrow.

Opposition Members will not face up to the background of what has happened to the other yards. I explained that background and set out the purpose of the policy. Opposition Members keep accusing me of being obsessed with privatisation, but this policy is not, in its origins, about privatising the yard. It is the Opposition who are obsessed with privatisation. Because an element of people bidding for particular yards has entered the scene, they are so obsessed by their preference for retaining what has proved to be an especially disastrous nationalisation of the yards that they insist on turning all their speeches around privatisation and saying that that is the root of the problem. It is not.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said that the reason for the cuts and lay-offs in the work force is the Government's activities. It is not: it is because there are no orders. The Danish work in Sunderland is now running down. Lay-offs were bound to come at this time. It is because there is nothing to build that lay-offs are taking place. If a Cuban order, an order for a bucket ship or any other order were obtained now, work could not begin until next year. Lay-offs are inevitable and it is misleading people to suggest that the present situation arose because of the Government and could have been avoided.

We did not start with the problem of ownership. We began by looking at British Shipbuilders' application for the intervention fund support for the Cuban order. That is the background to the order tonight. This is the fourth time in two years that we have had to come to the House for more money. Last year it was £20,000 per employee; it is £24,000 per employee this time—and we shall all approve that in a few minutes' time. The history has been one of making losses over and above intervention fund support on every order.

But the hon. Member for Dagenham, supported by his Friends, says, "Never mind. Let's just get the Cuban order"—the implication being, "at any price." The business is highly competitive: the Cubans are not bound to order with us. But the Opposition say that we should carry the cost overruns at the taxpayers' expense and then sort out ownership. That cannot be done. Such an approach would not only be in breach of the sixth directive and disallowed by the Commission, but would be disallowed quite sensibly, because it is utterly irresponsible trading of the sort that the Opposition indulged in with the Polish ship order when they were last in government.

The Opposition cannot claim that they envisage a serious future for the corporation. They simply say, "Let us get the order at any cost. Let us carry on as we are now." The Government examined the matter and have said, quite sensibly, that there can be no future in going along that path.

Mr. Gould: The Chancellor can resolve the dispute by giving a simple answer to this question: will he provide intervention fund support for the Cuban order, irrespective of ownership?

Mr. Clarke: We shall not give intervention fund support to British Shipbuilders, because its history is that it cannot comply with the sixth directive and it cannot stop making cost overruns on top.

The Cuban order has only become serious during the past few weeks, because Mambisa has only just received authority to place the order. We shall allow the Cubans to negotiate with any serious bidders and they will be notified of any bidders that we recommend. We shall give any serious bidders information about the order.

In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), we shall look at separate purchasers for the separate yards, if they come up. Mr. Copson—who needs a licence for his bucket ships—must apply for the licence. Mr. Zacchi, who has gone public, must put propositions to us. There are other purchasers who want to build other ships, but they have not gone public. We are negotiating with them. If other people think that they can buy these yards and take orders at intervention fund support levels within the sixth directive, the Government will consider them.

We shall also look at Appledore——

It being one and half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted Business).

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft British Shipbuilders Borrowing Powers (Increase of Limit) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 13 May, be approved.

SET-ASIDE REGULATIONS

Resolved,

That the draft Set-Aside Regulations 1988, which were laid before this House on 1st July 1988, be approved.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

Church of England (Pensions)

11.33 pm

Mr. Michael Alison (Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners): I beg to move,

That the Church of England (Pensions) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

This Measure is the latest in a series of Measures designed to modernise and improve the pension provisions of those who minister in the Church of England. I shall give a few details of the pensions payable. On completion of 37 years' service, a full pension of £5,330 is available to Church of England incumbents and, as a result of clause 1, the clergy scheme is extended to include deaconesses and licensed lay workers on exactly the same terms. The sum payable is reviewed annually and increased each April by at least the same proportion as the previous year's increase in the national minimum stipend for incumbents.

In addition, a capital sum of £12,900 tax-free is payable on retirement, which can clearly greatly help with the acquisition of a retirement home for members of the scheme. Further financial assistance in the form of loans at low interest rates is also available—repaid, if so desired, from the estate of the beneficiary on death. For those who do not want to purchase their own homes, the pensions board has purpose-built or other residential homes.

Widows of members of the Church of England pension scheme, which is now a non-contributory scheme, and covers the clergy and auxiliary ministry alike, are entitled to a survivorship pension equal to 60 per cent. of the pensions that their husbands would have received. In addition, every diocese has a group team assurance scheme under which widows receive a lump sum equal to three times the previous year's national minimum stipend.

Any child under 18 years of age at the time of a scheme member's death also receives a pension, as of right, until he or she reaches the age of 18. The sum is usually one sixth of the late father's pension entitlement. The pensions board can, in addition, give discretionary help to retired ministers or scheme members, their widows or widowers.

These broad provisions are, I believe, generous and highly commendable. They place the Church of England pension provisions, if not at the very top of private schemes, well into the upper quartile of such schemes. The payment of pensions now costs the Church Commissioners £39 million a year, taking the cost this year, for the first time, above the cost of stipends for working clergy. During the past five years, the commission contribution has increased no less than 73 per cent., which is way above the rate of inflation and indicate substantial real improvements for clergy pensioners.

There is, however, one area of provision about which the ecclesiastical committee has expressed regret in its report to the House, as hon. Members who have read it will note. It relates to the provision of pensions for a first spouse when a scheme member was divorced or has remarried. The General Synod took the view that, because the statutory or obligatory provision of pensions for first wives is the subject of an investigation by the Lord Chancellor's Department, it would be premature for the General Synod to go it alone, as it were, before the wider civil provision comes before the House.

Some members of the ecclesiastical committee took the view that the Church of England should have been a bit bolder and set the trend rather than wait to follow it. The fact that, for better of for worse, it decided not to go it alone, although perhaps regrettable, should not be allowed to detract from the broad general qualities of the Church of England's pension arrangements that I have described, nor suffice to deem the Measure other than expedient.

The matter was explored thoroughly in the oral evidence taken by the ecclesiastical committee, and in response to vigorous probings by, among others, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the chairman of the Pensions Board, Mr. Howard Gracey, made it plain that on an ex gratia, although not non-statutory, basis, the board makes provision by way of housing and of finance for divorced wives.

It would, I think, be tedious to take the House through every clause in the Measure, particularly as it has, in the ecclesiastical committee's report, substantial explanatory notes on each clause. By providing for a unified, non-contributory scheme for incumbents and auxiliaries alike, the process of steady improvement in provision has not been neglected, as evidenced in clause 3, with the provision, for the first time, of pensions for widowers, in clause 5 of lump sums payments on death—in addition to those payable on retirement—and provision for early retirement otherwise than on grounds of ill health, which is already provided for. These are all good grounds in themselves for commending the Measure to the House.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) was kind enough to refer to the debate in the ecclesiastical committee, when several of us raised the status of divorced clergy wives. He correctly reported the committee's decision and its regret that the pensions board would not act imaginatively. The Church's behaviour on that is, to put it mildly, rather pathetic. Many of us look to it to take the lead, not to follow the secular state.

The right hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention to the commissioners' impressive record of building up pension entitlements for the clergy and other Church workers. The Measure has been a long time coming—so long that some people thought that it would have gone through by now, and have made retirement plans on the basis of it being on the statute book. I shall not take up further time and prevent its enactment.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I will be even more brief than the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). The Measure is welcome. I confirm that it is the general view that the provisions of pensions by the Church is generous, good and fair. The Measure helps in that. I also want to flag up a linked issue to which the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) referred once in passing. This relates to the other side of the coin. The other matter that concerns the clergy and their families and for which they plan during their working lives is where they will live after retirement.

Another matter that is not quite as certain or secure sometimes is adequacy of accommodation for clergy in their retirement. I hope that the Church will complement its good work in this Measure by ensuring that all those who give their lives to the ordained ministry can be assured, for their entire retirement, of adequate and suitable housing of a type and in a place that they wish. That is equally important, and where it has not been met and achieved, it lacks the provision that pensions now have by virtue of this consolidating and expanded measure.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Church of England (Pensions) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

Prisoners of War (Compensation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

10.40 pm

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I begin by drawing the attention of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office to all-party early-day motion 119 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce) which has now attracted 176 signatures and which will, I promise, attract a great deal more. The motion summarises succinctly what I am about to say. It states:

"That this House, in welcoming the growing friendship between Japan and the United Kingdom, believes that this friendship will not fully blossom until the wrongs done during the Second World War to Allied prisoners are fully accepted by the Japanese Government and due reparation made."

In 1941, at a moment of great peril for our country, locked as we were in deadly conflict with Nazi Germany, the Japanese struck suddenly and without warning at the Americans, the Dutch and overselves in the Pacific. By the time Singapore had fallen, over 50,000 British service men and women and civilians, 20,000 Australians and 1,700 Canadians who had defended Hong Kong with great gallantry had fallen into enemy hands. Such was the appalling treatment of these helpless prisoners that over a quarter of them were either to be slaughtered in cold blood or to die of disease, malnutrition and unbelievable brutality by the time the Japanese surrendered.

I was a member of the personal staff of the Supreme Allied Commander in South-East Asia, Admiral Lord Mountbatten. I was in Asia in 1945 when the Japanese surrendered. I was moved to tears by the first sight of the pitiful survivors who came out from the hell of Japanese captivity. Many of them, still in their 20s, were to die prematurely, many more were disabled and crippled for life.

It is difficult at this distance of time to describe what they had endured. Field Marshal Slim, one of our greatest soliders, has put on record what the victorious British 14th Army found as it over ran the prison camps. He wrote:

"The state of these camps and of their wretched inmates can only be realised by those who saw them as they were at this time. Except for derelict huts and bashas, the camps were little more than barbed wire enclosures in which wild beasts might have been herded together. The Japanese and Korean gaolers, almost without exception, were at the best callously indifferent to suffering, or at the worst, bestially sadistic. The food was of a quality and a quantity barely enough to keep men alive, let alone fit them for the hard labour that most were driven to perform. It was horrifying to see them moving slowly about these sordid camps, all emaciated, many walking skeletons, numbers covered with suppurating sores, and most naked but for the ragged shorts they had worn for years or loin cloths of sacking. The most heart-moving of all were those who lay on wretched pallets, their strength ebbing faster than relief could be brought to them."

He concluded:

"There can be no excuse for a nation which as a matter of policy treats its prisoners of war in this way, and no honour for any army, however brave, which willingly makes itself the instrument of such inhumanity to the helpless".

I will mention just one case—I could mention a thousand—recounted to me by a former prisoner who suffered greatly. He refers to what happened to one of his comrades in Sonkrai camp on the notorious Siam-Burma railway. He said:

"He was chained to the teak tree at the entrance of the camp and we had to pass him every dawn when going out to work and at night when returning to Camp. We could do nothing to assist him or even get near him. He was left to die —in his own filth—exposed to the heat of the day and the cold at night. Tropical exposure is a nightmare. He grew weaker; no food or water was given to him and as death approached he lapsed into hallucinations and delirium. At nights, you could have heard a pin drop as we listened to his cries. It was sheer agony. In the end he died; a shocking and unnecessary death. The Japanese guards danced round his body shouting with glee. They enjoyed every moment of it."

I was already a Member of Parliament when, in May 1951, hon. Members pressed the Government of the day to ensure that when the peace treaty was to be signed later that year there should be compensation for the appalling sufferings our men had endured. I recall vividly the powerful arguments of Jackie Smyth, VC, who had fought in Burma, the eloquence of George Thomas, who was later to become our Speaker and is now Lord Tonypandy, and the moving personal testimony of the late Lawrence Turner, the hon. Member for Oxford, who had been a prisoner and whose health never recovered from the experience.

It was not to much avail, for under the provisions of the treaty our service men were awarded the princely sum of £76·50, while civilians received £48·50. The excuse for accepting such derisory sums was that the Japanese economy was in ruins.

All that was 37 years ago. It may be asked, why revive the argument now? There are two reasons. First, we should demonstrate that violations of international law, as Japanese behaviour certainly was, are never to be tolerated by civilised nations and that, where there has been a denial of basic human rights, adequate reparation must be made.

Secondly, since the 1950s the wheel of fortune has turned favourably for Japan. Today, she is a stable democracy and the second richest nation on earth. She plays a responsible role in the management of the world economy and is ready to help in the eradication of world poverty. All that is greatly to the credit of the Japanese people and their Government, but, if the slate is to be wiped clean and Japan is to take her place in the comity of civilised nations—if she is to enjoy the respect of the international community and to be honoured for her virtues and achievements—there has to be contrition for past crimes and proper compensation for the victims still living and the families of those whose lives were destroyed. That is the view of many hon. Members. It is certainly the view of survivors of Japanese prison camps and for them we should realise that the years are fast slipping away.

A lead has been taken by the Hong Kong Veterans of Canada, who have lodged a claim for compensation with the United Nations Human Rights Commission. They are supported by the International Commission of Jurists, Amnesty International, the International Committee of the Red Cross, the World Veterans Federation and the International Commission of Health Professionals, all of whom have status as non-governmental organisations to engage in such an undertaking.

The Canadian initiative has been systematic. Their approach to the United Nations Human Rights Commission is based on resolution 1503 of the United Nations Economic and Social Council of 1970. Their case is founded on an impressive in-depth study of the medical sequelae of what happened to the victims of Japanese cruelty. It presents a declaration of principle for consideration by the United Nations of compensation for gross violations of human rights. I understand that Australian veterans may be taking parallel action. There is to be a preliminary hearing at the United Nations in New York next month.

I am advised that, although Japan did not sign the Geneva conventions, that has been held by experts in international law to be of no consequence, since the Japanese Government of the day were aware that such a code existed and that the conventions had been accepted as the customary law of nations.

I hope, therefore, that I shall not be told by my hon. and learned Friend, as my colleagues have been told by other Ministers, that article 14(b) of the peace treaty specifically waived all claims that were not expressly provided for in the treaty itself, and that, in 1954, it was agreed that payment of a global sum of $4·8 million would be regarded as a full discharge by the Japanese Government of their obligations under article 16 of the treaty. No Government had and no Government have any right to sign away an obligation by another state to compensate for gross violations of the human rights of individuals and for the death and injury that occur in future years as a result of the sufferings that the Japanese inflicted on their helpless captives.

The relevant conventions expressly forbid such action by Governments. The regulations annexed to the 1907 Hague convention concerning "the laws and customs of war on land" provide that

"a belligerent party which violates the provisions . . . shall, if the case demands, be liable to pay compensation. It shall be responsible for all acts committed by persons forming part of its Armed Forces."

Article 130 of the third Geneva convention of 1949 refers specifically to grave breaches of human rights, such as

"wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment including biological experiments, wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health."

They were hourly and daily occurrences in Japanese prisoner-of-war camps. Article 131 significantly goes on to state that

"no High Contracting Party shall be allowed to absolve itself or any other High Contracting Party of any liability incurred by itself or by another High Contracting Party in respect of . . . breaches."

I am advised that the International Committee of the Red Cross supports the legal argument of the Canadian veterans that the peace treaty that the allied powers entered into with Japan does not remove Japanese legal and financial obligations to the victims of violations of the Geneva conventions. The conventions clearly provide that Japan shall not be absolved from compensation liability in respect of breaches committed by its armies during world war 2.

The Geneva conventions literally follow the Hague convention of 1907 and do not abrogate it in any way. Therefore, they are part of the customary law of all nations. A further consideration strengthens the Canadian claim and thereby strengthens any British or Australian claim. One of the non-governmental organisations supporting the veterans is the World Veterans Federation. My hon. Friend should note that, at the fifth international conference on legislation concerning veterans and war victims held at Bad Ischl on 21 to 24 April this year, it was agreed that there should be compensation for victims of acts contrary to international humanitarian law because of the post-traumatic stress disorders of such acts. A recommendation was made that the World Veterans Federation should initiate and support steps towards that end.

In short, the Japanese should not be allowed to escape the consequences of the damage that they inflicted on helpless prisoners for the rest of their natural lives.

It may be that the Japanese will answer that the peace treaty was the end of the matter—that is what Ministers have been saying. I suppose that if the United Nations ever ruled otherwise, it could not compel Japan to make reparation. If that proves to be the case, I am bound to say here and now that it will confirm the views held by many people in this country and elsewhere in the West that Japan can never be regarded as a civilised nation.

I pray that it turns out otherwise. Opinion in Japan is sensitive to the issue. There has been a stirring of conscience as a result of the revelations of earlier appalling atrocities committed by the Imperial Japanese Army in China before the second world war. The Canadian reference to the UN should help to encourage this process of inward questioning and with this the Japanese Camp Survivors Association in this country heartily concurs.

The Canadian Government are not involved in the claim being made by its veterans and I am not asking that Her Majesty's Government should be involved in any claim that might be made by British veterans. All I ask is that the Ministers here should stop saying that the rights of individual victims were signed away in 1951. It is shameful that such an argument should have ever been used. I have demonstrated that it is unsound in international law. Moreover, the action of the Canadian veterans shows that there is indeed a case to answer.

If our Government cannot help directly, I want an assurance that they will not impede action by the Japanese Camp Survivors Association or any other British veterans. Better still, they should show readiness to provide positive help and information as the Minister for veterans' affairs in the Canadian Government has done in respect of the Canadian veterans.

Therefore I shall listen with the greatest care to what my hon. and learned Friend says in reply but I would, with great respect, remind him that he will be speaking here in a free Parliament, as all his predecessors have done since the end of world war 2, because the men and women of my generation stood and fought cruel and repellent enemies who, if they had prevailed, would have blotted out our freedom. There is therefore an obligation on the part of any British Government to those who died and to those who suffered in enemy hands. It may be very late in the day but I submit that there is still time for the new democratic Japan to make amends if it will. Our Government should encourage her to do so.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) for permitting me to participate in his Adjournment debate. He has a distinguished record, not only in this House but previously, to our country during time of war when he served, as I am delighted to record as a Staffordshire Man, with the North Staffordshire Regiment. I am only sorry that it was not with the South Staffs. There is another bond between us apart from our joint membership of this House, because my father served on Mountbatten's staff of the South-East Asia command during the second world war as a Royal Air Force liaison officer.

I join my right hon. Friend in this debate because I had occasion to have at my surgery one survivor of the Japanese prisoner-of-war camps, Mr. Robert Kelly, now aged 72 years, who worked on the infamous bridge over the River Kwai. For somebody of my post-war generation, like my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, to see before me a man who had worked in that infamous and intolerable labour camp in those appalling conditions brought home to me, as I hope that it will to my hon. and learned Friend, the fact that our generation owes a great deal to that generation and the sacrifices that it made.

In adding to the contribution which my right hon. Friend has made so eloquently, I shall add only two points. First, those men are a diminishing band. They are now in their twilight years and many are in straitened circumstances. It must be borne in mind that not only the physical but the mental anguish that they suffered at those barbarous hands all those years ago will have unquestionably debilitated them and impaired their earning capacity during their lifetime. They therefore find themselves more readily in straitened circumstances than their fellow citizens who served in the war but who did not go through those horrors.

My right hon. Friend has already said that, in 1954, when the agreement was signed, Japan was on its knees, it was trying to recover and rejoin the comity of nations. Today Japan is probably the most economically powerful nation on earth. I do not believe that it is immoral or improper for hon. Members to campaign on behalf of their constituents and to suggest to Japan that, in view of its enormous success—which it has been able to enjoy as a result of joining the free world and the free trade of that world—it should feel able to make some further recompense.

I do not believe that £76·50 paid in 1954 should represent the full and final settlement. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will be able to assure my right hon. Friend, myself and our 200 colleagues on both sides of the House who have signed the early-day motion tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce), that Her Majesty's Government will not be found wanting by our constituents.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Mellor): I am glad to have this opportunity to answer a debate that has been instigated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), the Father of our House. His largesse of spirit has been shown so often in such debates—not least by what he has said tonight. It is a pleasure for me to answer any debates in which he participates having regard to the great kindness that he has shown me, and the support that he has given me over the years. It therefore saddens me that, although agreeing with many of the points that he raised, I shall be unable to give him much more satisfaction than some of my predecessors have done.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) is right to say that those of us of the post-war generation who today live in freedom owe an enormous debt of gratitude to those who served in the war. We owe a particular debt to those who suffered as dreadfully as those whom my right hon. Friend starkly described, those who suffered at the hands of the Japanese. My father spent most of the war fighting in the far east, but, happily, he was never taken prisoner. He has told me of things that, once experienced, he has never forgotten; he remembers them as vividly as my right hon. Friend.

There is no dissent about the facts. We also know that the suffering was shared by thousands of Americans, Australians, Canadians, New Zealanders and other allies and by many thousands of civilians who were also treated appallingly. Although it is more than 40 years since those events, some wounds do not heal. If we had suffered in the same way, would the bitterness and anger ever disappear? I doubt it. Therefore, I am not surprised at the response that my right hon. Friend has had from a number of veterans to the case that he has raised.

I also understand the feeling at the heart of this matter —the feelings of those who, having suffered at the hands of the Japanese, now see a rich and successful Japan. They must believe that they surely deserve some further compensation.

My right hon. Friend, drawing on his 40 years of experience, was able to recall vividly the debate in the House in May 1951, when I was two years of age. At that time, it was a live issue and a great deal was said. Arguments were put forcefully and passed into the minds of the British negotiators. Behind the debate in the House lay many hours of discussion with the Far East Prisoners of War Association, which made a valuable contribution to the debate.

The negotiations proceeded on a bipartisan basis, the treaty of peace with Japan was signed by a Labour Government and ratified by their Conservative successors. The British delegation led the way in insisting that there should be a specific provision for compensation for former prisoners of war. That was not in the original treaty, and it is an unusual provision in a peace treaty, which reflects the uniquely dreadful treatment suffered by our service men in the far east.

As we know, the result was the peace treaty signed in San Francisco on 8 September 1951, which formally brought to an end the state of war between the United Kingdom and Japan. The treaty contained a number of articles, of which two are particularly germane. Article 14 concerned the general question of compensation and recognised that reparation should be made. It gave the allied powers the right to seize and dispose of Japanese property, which, alas, although my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point castigates the point, I fear cannot be readily evaded. Article 14(b) concludes with these words:

"Except as otherwise provided in the present Treaty the Allied Powers waive all reparations claims of the Allied Powers, other claims of the Allied Powers and their nationals arising out of any actions taken by Japan and its nationals in the course of the prosecution of the war . . .".

Article 16 makes specific provision for the compensation of prisoners. That is what we might call the British article, upon which we insisted. Under that article, the sum of £4·5 million was paid and there was an agreed minute between the Japanese and the allied powers recording that payment and stating that the payment would be recognised "as a full discharge by the Japanese Government of its obligations under Article 16 of the Peace Treaty".

Out of that, we in the United Kingdom received just over £1·6 million. That was made available to the former far east prisoners of war. The sum that has been described was the sum that was paid. Although the sum of £76 was worth a good deal more in 1952 than it is today, I well understand and appreciate that it was extremely small sum.

Sir Bernard Braine: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend puts me in difficulties. I wanted to make the case. I do not want to be discourteous to him, but would he allow me to finish?

Sir Bernard Braine: I want to ask my hon. and learned Friend just one question in the limited time available. Does he agree, as a lawyer, that the treaty does not absolve Japan from the conventions? That is the charge that has been put to the United Nations. This is a new situation.

Mr. Mellor: We believe that the treaty that was signed is binding on us and was a full and final settlement. Whether it is right or wrong, that is the position today and we do not see any way round it. I can assure my right hon. Friend that it is not wilfulness on our part; that is just the best objective interpretation that we can give. Every Government have had to defend that position and give such an interpretation over the past 40 years, and I fear that I have no authority to diverge from that.

We can only rest on the fact that it is the function of peace treaties to put an end to claims. If that were not so, we would still be concerned about disputes throughout the centuries. No compensation would be adequate to meet the sufferings of the people concerned. I understand that this compensation will seem to many people peculiarly inadequate, but we can find no legal basis for going back to the Japanese Government and asking for more. It has been the opinion of successive Governments, and it remains the opinion of this Government, based as best we can on an objective assessment of the documents, that to seek to go back on the undertakings to which we put our signature would not be an act of good faith and could not be justified.

My right hon. Friend has raised the Canadian initiative. I am grateful to him for giving me advance notice, with his typical courtesy, of all his points, which I hope will allow me to deal with them. If I run out of time, I shall write to him, because I want him to have a proper explanation.

We do not think that it would be proper for the Government to press the claim. That was one of the considerations that the Canadian Government have had to bear in mind. I understand that it is an independent association called War Amputations of Canada which have submitted the claim to the United Nations Human Rights Commission on behalf of the Hong Kong Veterans Association. I was interested to hear my right hon. Friend say that his claim has the support of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the International Commission of Health, Professionals and other non-governmental organisations that have consultative status at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. I understand that a delegation of former prisoners of war went to the 44th Commission on Human Rights in February, but I am not aware that any non-governmental organisation with consultative status raised the delegation's concern in that forum.

[Mr. Mellor]

My right hon. Friend also mentioned that this claim was submitted under the procedures based on resolution 1503. I have every sympathy for the claimants—I cannot stress that enough—but I am afraid that the chances of success under this procedure cannot, in my judgment, be high. One of the criteria applied under that resolution when judging whether claims are admissible is that the allegation of the violation of human rights must be submitted within a reasonable period, and the 40 years that have elapsed may be held to be not within that proviso.

A second difficulty is that the question may be outside the mandate of the United Nations, since that body was not in existence at the time when the violations took plac.. All I——

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Pen Tops

9.34 am

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I beg to ask leave to present, on behalf of the community of Braunstone and the citizens of Leicester, a petition that has more than 10,000 signatories. It follows the tragic death on 9 October 1987 of Billy Walker, aged 11. His death followed choking on the top of a Bic pen. The Bic company, the manufacturers of the pen, refused—disgracefully—to discuss the matter with its Member of Parliament.

The boy's parents have campaigned courageously so that there may be no repetition of this accident through ignorance or inaction. The petition states:

"The humble petition of the community of Braunstone and Leicester citizens, sheweth That following the tragic death of Billy Walker (aged 11 on 9 October 1987, whilst in Wycliffe Community College, Hamelin Road, Leicester) the notorious hazard of asphyxiation, owing to obstruction of the respiratory system by a pen top, was highlighted. Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will urge the Government to ensure the taking of immediate steps to remove the danger presented to children through the availability of pen tops and similar objects in both school and home and so eliminating the hazard that led to the tragic death of Billy Walker.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc."

To lie upon the Table.

Official Secrets

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

9.36 am

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Hurd): The House has today an early opportunity to comment on the proposals in our White Paper, which I laid before the House on 29 June. We promised to bring forward early legislation and in preparing that legislation we shall, of course, want to reflect carefully on what is said today.

I believe that the mood of the House—and, indeed, the mood outside—is that the time has come to settle this question. There has been clear discontent with section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 for at least the past 20 years. Serious proposals for reform were put forward by the Franks committee 16 years ago. Both the previous Labour Government and the present Government set out proposals, drawn from Franks, for reform. Despite that, section 2 is still with us. We cannot simply drift on, relying on legislation that no one considers to be reliable, and trusting in an all-embracing definition in which no one has any confidence.

I have studied the matter for some time and I am forced reluctantly to the conclusion that it is unlikely that we shall reach total agreement. There is, however, wide acceptance that the proposals contained in the White Paper are a reasonable foundation for the reform of section 2. Now we need to get on with it.

Hon. Members will have had the opportunity to read the White Paper. A number of misconceptions have been circulating about the proposals and there have been a number of misrepresentations in the press. I should like to lay some of those misrepresentations to rest. It has, for example, been suggested that we propose that no member of the security and intelligence services should ever be able to talk or write about his work. It has also been suggested that we are applying to members of those services a new regime of criminal restrictions, that no information, whatever its origin, on certain matters can be disclosed and that we propose to remove existing defences of prior publication and public interest. None of those assertions stands up.

I should like to set out briefly to the House the basic principles on which the proposals rest.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I assume that now that the Home Secretary has asserted that those theories are untrue, he will at some point return to them and explain why he holds that rather strange view.

Mr. Hurd: Of course. It is sensible to start with the principles, and that is what I intend to do.

First, our proposals apply only to official information, by which is meant information that is held by a Crown servant or Government contractor in the course of his duties. If the information disclosed cannot be traced back to a Crown servant or Government contractor, it is not covered by our proposals. It might have come from a completely different source. If, for example, another Government's information was leaked directly by an employee of that Government, it could be published in this country even though it had also been provided to the United Kingdom Government in confidence. Although the information disclosed was identical to the information held by the Government, it would not be official information and our proposals would not apply to it. Secondly, our proposals apply only to the publication, without authority, of the information that we propose to protect. A great deal of information, even in the subjects covered by our proposals, has been and will continue to be made known with authority of Parliament and to the public.

Of course it will not be an offence to disclose information in all categories without authority. Our central objective is to narrow the law so that it applies only to disclosure without authority of official information which is likely to give rise to an unacceptable degree of harm to the public interest. The first step towards defining such disclosures is to identify the areas of information in which harmful disclosures might be made. We have identified six in the White Paper. For reasons given in the White Paper, we believe that none of the information in two of the areas can be disclosed without the likelihood of unacceptable harm to the public interest. In a third, information useful in the commission of crime, disclosure is by definition harmful. In proving, as they would have to, that the information is in this category, the prosecution will be proving that its disclosure is harmful.

In the remaining three categories—the particularly sensitive areas of security and intelligence, of defence and of international relations—a distinction has to be drawn between information which cannot be disclosed without the likelihood of harm to the public interest, and information which can—the test of harm. That distinction can be made only in relation to a particular disclosure. The task of making the distinction we propose to place on the jury. To make that possible, we propose to define clearly the specific forms of harm to the public interest to which the disclosure of information in each category might give rise.

This is a considerable change from the proposals that the Government put forward in 1979. Under those proposals as under the Labour Government's proposals the question whether the disclosure of information relating to defence or international relations was harmful to the nation would have been decided by a Minister. Of course, we looked hard at the point and retraced the whole history of the idea of ministerial certificates. We decided, having done that, that ministerial certificates had no future. Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I know, fear that we may have gone too far in that direction. It is true that we are setting the prosecution a sizeable task but not one which in normal circumstances should provide insurmountable obstacles.

There is always a risk of a jury occasionally bringing in a perverse verdict, but that is true now and it would be true even if we had retained ministerial certificates. The jury will always have the last word. No one is suggesting that Ministers in place of a jury should decide whether an alleged offender is guilty or innocent. Since that is so, it is better that the jury should make up its mind on the basis of all the evidence than that it should feel that certain relevant matters are being withheld from it. We believe that it is right in principle and practice that the question of specified harm to the public interest should be determined by the jury.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Would the Home Secretary place the verdict of the jury in the Ponting case in the category of "perverse"?

Mr. Hurd: I cannot comment on the verdicts of juries in any recent case. I have not done so and I will not do so. I am simply referring to the future. I am trying to deal with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) that by doing away with the notion of ministerial certificates, we are placing too heavy a weight on the jury. I do not think that that is so.

Even if the jury decides that a disclosure is likely to cause the specified harm to public interest, the discloser will be convicted only if he knew or had reason to believe that such harm was likely to be caused. It is clearly wrong to penalise somebody who had no way of knowing the harm that he was doing. Our proposals will ensure that such a person is not liable to conviction.

Those are the essential elements—the backbone—of our proposals. I hope that most people will accept that they are coherent and reasonable. I want now to address briefly a number of specific anxieties which have been raised.

I mentioned earlier the test of harm to be applied to the disclosure of information relating to security or intelligence. We are not proposing that any such test should apply to disclosure of such information by members or former members of the security and intelligence services or certain other people. This is nothing new. The people in these categories cannot now disclose such information without authority, without risking criminal proceedings. We are not making life more difficult or matters worse for them. We are simply leaving them, for the reasons that we have given in the White Paper, essentially as they are.

I stress again that I am talking about disclosures without authority. Members and former members of the services have in the past been authorised to talk or write about their work, and they will be so authorised in the future, but for a member to disclose information about security and intelligence without authority is, we believe, a betrayal of the trust that the nation places in those services, for very good reasons—because of the nature of the work they do and of the protection they provide for all of us.

We propose that certain people should be designated as having the same criminal liability as members or former members of the services, and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) expressed some concern about this power. Those who are designated will be so told when they are designated, so there is no question of someone being designated because he is thought to be troublesome, or of his being designated retrospectively after an alleged offence. Designation will not be applied to all those who have contact with the security and intelligence services, still less to all those who see the information provided by those services. A certain number of people have duties that involve them working so closely with the security and intelligence services that they acquire an extensive knowledge of their organisation and operations, and we think that these people should share the same liability as members and former members of those services.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Will my right hon. Friend explain in a little more detail whether categories of people or individuals are to be so designated?

Mr. Hurd: They will be designated individually. We shall need to work out carefully how that is to be done. For example, some of the people in my private office are civil servants and officials in a Government Department, who nevertheless acquire, inevitably, an extensive knowledge of the affairs of the services—perhaps a more extensive knowledge, in some cases, than most members of the services.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House, having given that specific analysis of who is or who is not designated, that someone who gave information to the security service on a one-off basis would not be so designated?

Mr. Hurd: I have given that assurance. There will be no question of designating someone retrospectively because something had been said or done.

There has been some anxiety about our proposal that information relating to security or intelligence, defence or international relations that we provide to other Governments or to international organisations should not lose the protection of the criminal law if it is leaked abroad. I recognise that this is controversial. It is one of the few points on which we are strengthening the existing law. We considered it very carefully and I ask the House to do the same. In areas central to the security and well-being of the nation, the most effective means to pursue our interests is through international co-operation, and we find this more and more.

If that co-operation is to be effective in, for example, fighting terrorism, we must exchange sensitive information with other countries. As the law stands at present, despite all that another country may do to protect our information if it is leaked abroad by a foreign national, it is not an offence to disclose it in this country, even if such an offence would do serious harm to the public interest and despite the fact that it was official information. We do not think that that is right, so we propose that such disclosure should be an offence in the same way as it would be if the leak had occurred in this country. There would be a test of harm. The prosecution would still have to prove to a jury beyond reasonable doubt that the specified harm was likely to arise and that the discloser knew that it was. The object of the proposal is to protect international co-operation in those vital areas of the nation's interests.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Will the Secretary of State tell us what would happen in the case of an MI6, MI5 or other intelligence officer who discovered that his colleagues and perhaps even his superiors were planning to undermine or subvert the Government of the day? Would that official be captured by criminal action or under the provisions of the Bill, or are there other means by which he could bring to light the subversion that might be taking place?

Mr. Hurd: Indeed, there are. I am about to deal with the public interest defence. The hon. Gentleman is leaping ahead a little.

Because of the interest expressed in the notion that lies behind the hon. Gentleman's question, that there should be a general public interest defence in the cases that he has mentioned, I should stress that we are not taking away anything that now exists in the way of a defence. It is true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) pointed out, that there are some words of uncertain meaning in section 2, which one or two defendants have claimed allowed the court to consider whether their disclosure was in the public interest, but it is also true to say that the courts have never accepted those words as referring other than to the public interest as decided by the institutions of Government in this country.

We have set out in the White Paper why we think that the introduction of a general public interest defence can be no part of the narrowly targeted scheme that we propose. We believe that that would bring confusion into the law where we are seeking to achieve certainty. It is not a defence to any other offence that the wider or longer-term effects of the criminal act are beneficial and that that benefit outweighs the harm done. Someone who commits a robbery and spends the proceeds of his crime for the public good is still a robber. The defence that he has used the money for good purpose does not apply.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): What about a specific defence of public interest?

Mr. Hurd: I am talking about a general principle which the hon. and learned Gentleman will accept.

A person who, by some disclosure, knowingly causes unacceptable harm to the public interest in the hope of doing some wider good is still committing an offence. A person who finds himself in the unlikely position to which the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) referred has a recourse in the first instance to his superiors. He may not want his immediate superiors to know of his anxiety or complaint. To that end, last November we established a staff counsellor system, the first counsellor being Sir Philip Woodfield. Such a person can go to the counsellor, bypassing, if necessary, his immediate superiors and having access to the Secretary of the Cabinet and perhaps, as the Prime Minister's written answer on this point explains, ultimately to the Minister responsible for that service, either my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary or myself, and to the Prime Minister. That recourse was laid down in Parliament, although admittedly, it has only recently been brought into being and is in addition to the ordinary processes of responsibility for the services that we are discussing. It is an additional buttress to meet the point raised by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): My right hon. Friend may have been wrongly advised about section 2(1)(a) of the 1911 Act, which he says is not being swept away, because all judicial figures in the past have accepted that the interests of the Government and of the state are one and the same. My right hon. Friend is correct in remembering that the judge in the Ponting case and the judge in the Compton Mackenzie case took that line. However, tracing cases through, including the Sunday Telegraph case of which I have some knowledge, the judicial figures have gone in the opposite direction. Sir Winston Churchill relied on that defence, although he was never prosecuted, and Mr. Duncan-Sandys relied on that defence, when civil servants came to brief them on the lack of preparedness of Britain's military defences, because it was in the interests of the state for someone to go and tell a Privy Councillor that secret. My right hon. Friend is going down the wrong road when he says that it is of no importance to remove that key defence of the interest of the state.

Mr. Hurd: Although my hon. Friend may catch your eye later, Madam Deputy Speaker, I do not think that he can show a statement of the court or a judgment of a judge which accepts that those words imply or contain a general public interest defence. In all those matters, under the existing law and under our proposal, a jury will have to make up its mind, but juries do not give reasons and, if my advice is sound, as I believe it is, I do not believe that the courts have established that there is a general public interest defence under the present law.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Secretary of State accept that he has said that, on the one hand, there will be an absolute offence and that, on the other hand, juries may acquit, despite the absence of a public interest defence? Is not the consequence, therefore, that he is inviting juries in a residue of cases to deliver what he would call perverse verdicts on the grounds of the public interest? If that is the logical conclusion, as it surely must be, why does he not write, not a general public interest defence, but a specific public interest defence into the legislation?

Mr. Hurd: That is a contradiction in terms. I am not inviting a jury to do anything. I am simply observing that, in this country, anyone who faces a charge that might land them a substantial term of punishment, has the right for that to be decided by a jury. That is true under the present law and will be true under our proposals. It is certainly not for a Minister to say what a jury will do. If a future Government were foolish enough to indulge in trivial or vindictive prosecutions, a jury is there as a safeguard. That is why we have a jury. I am not predicting what it would do. I am simply observing that it is the jury that decides.

I wish to deal now with the other defence that it has been suggested we should include specifically, that of prior publication. Again, there is no such defence in the existing law. I hope that those who are attracted by the idea of that defence will recognise that, in our proposals, with their central emphasis on harmful disclosure, an absolute defence of that kind does not fit. In relation to the two categories of information where there is no test of harm, we believe, for the reasons that I have given, that any disclosure is harmful.

In relation to the other categories, if, despite the fact that the information has previously been published, the prosecution can satisfy a jury beyond reasonable doubt both that the particular disclosure of that information was likely to cause the specified harm to the public interest and that the discloser knew that it was, I do not see what grounds are there for saying he is not culpable. It will be open to the defence to argue that the new disclosure could do no harm because there had been a previous disclosure, the burden will be on the prosecution to prove otherwise, and it would be for the jury to decide whether the fact that there has been prior publication negates the prosecution's claim that a test of harm has been passed.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I am not sure how that can be true in relation to information given in confidence by foreign Governments. The White Paper rules out the argument of prior publication abroad, because that would be damaging in itself, so, for the purposes of the defence, we are dealing with a first publication and there could be no pleading along these lines.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right in the case of information that is supplied in confidence by a foreign Government—unless, of course, that information had already been published abroad, in which case it would not have been derived in this country and would not be official information. Perhaps my hon. Friend will study what I said at the beginning of my speech as it gives an example of some of the misconceptions which apply. He will find that that covers the point.

I turn now to what has been said about the discipline code for Crown servants. I believe that Mr. Des Wilson is the arch-priest of that doctrine. It has been said in some places that, to counteract the narrowing of section 2, which even Mr. Wilson has been forced to agree we are undertaking, we propose to extend discipline so that Crown servants will never be able to say anything about anything without risking dismissal. This is nonsense. As the White Paper explains, it will be necessary to make some changes to conduct rules to reflect the fact that section 2 has been replaced by a very much narrower law. In practice, the discipline code will continue to be applied much as it is at present. The clarifying changes that I am talking about, which will be needed, will be discussed in the usual way with the Civil Service trade unions.

Although the White Paper does not deal or purport to deal with freedom of information, I want to say a word on that subject. No Government have made so much official information available to the public or Parliament. I shall give one or two examples because at the moment this part of the case has not been brought effectively before the House. Let us take as an example the prison system in my Department, which is possibly the most difficult area with which the Home Office deals. We have opened up the prison system to a far greater extent in recent years than was ever done in the past. The media have been given much greater access to prisons.

Although I am not responsible for Scottish prisons, who would have thought it conceivable even a year or so ago that the media would have been admitted to a Scottish prison in the circumstances which enabled both main television news channels to carry extensive coverage last night? That would have been wholly inconceivable, but such things now happen because Government Departments are opening up and are making available to the public, direct and through the media, far greater areas of policy and administration than ever before.

We encourage boards of visitors to publish their annual reports, often to our embarrassment, but we specifically encourage it to happen. Every Department has similar initiatives to record. The Department of Education and Science has been publishing the reports of school inspectors since 1983. The Ministry of Defence has invited the press into sensitive establishments at Porton Down and Aldermaston. Who would have thought that that would have been possible under previous Labour and Conservative Governments? The Defence White Paper includes a mass of new information.

The Treasury now publishes its economic forecasts. The public expenditure White Paper has grown from a mere 170 pages in 1978 and is now a formidably informative document of 500 pages. To come to what some regard as the nub of the debate, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has given this House more information about the Security Service than any of her predecessors by far.

Perhaps it is inevitable that, like Tantalus, the representatives of the media should always be reaching out for the fruit which is just beyond their reach. I hope that they will accept and not neglect the huge increase in the harvest of information that is now available.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): What extra information will be made available and accessible by the introduction of this White Paper, apart from the areas to which the right hon. Gentleman might refer, which will begin to be subject, in any case, to the civil law?

Mr. Hurd: This is not a freedom of information White Paper and we do not propose to introduce a freedom of information Bill. I am simply stating as a matter of fact the outflow and the cornucopia of information from this Government on matters which all our predecessors would have thought should continue to be locked up. I foresee that that flow of increasing information, spreading ever outwards, will continue.

Perhaps we should step back from the detail for a moment to consider what difference the White Paper proposals will make. The answer is that almost all—the great bulk of—official information would cease to be protected by the criminal law. That is a huge change. Any critic of our proposals who does not start by recognising that fact is letting prejudice obscure judgment.

A great deal of the information which is no longer to be protected by the criminal law is of a minor kind and should never have been brought within the criminal law. However, some of it is highly sensitive material. Some of it, like the Budget proposals or the type of economic information which is protected specifically by the 1978 White Paper cannot be disclosed without the risk of some harm to the public interest, but we have decided that the degree of harm which disclosure of such information may entail is not enough to justify the use of the criminal law.

Anyone who has served in Government, and I hope every Member of the House, will accept that that is not and was not an easy decision, nor was it taken lightly. It amounts to an earthquake in Whitehall. We have set the threshold where it seemed to us it ought to be. We are now discussing the boundaries of a small territory within the total empire which needs continued protection. There may be disagreement about how we define that territory and what we call it, but the boundary disputes, important though they are, do not crucially affect the size of the territory or alter the basic fact of the huge change which we propose to bring about.

Some people are arguing that we are introducing harsh new powers over the information in this remaining protected territory. There has been some prattle in the press about censorship, and the word "draconian" springs rather too easily to the lips of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. Now that he has had time to read the White Paper, as opposed to press accounts of what it was going to contain, he can see that, even in this remaining protected territory, we are removing powers and liberalising definitions.

Of course we want the law to protect effectively the territory which we think should still be protected. We want a new law which will work, but we are actually making just two proposals which would extend the present law. The first is to make it an offence for a member or former member of the security and intelligence services to disclose information which purports to relate to security or intelligence. The reasons for this are set out in paragraphs 43 and 44 of the White Paper and have not drawn a great deal of comment.

The second is the proposal which I have already explained, which relates to why we believe that future legislation should protect any information relating to security or intelligence, defence or international relations which we provide in confidence to other Governments or international organisations.

Those two minor additions to the present law will apply to particular categories of information in particular circumstances. Every other move, even in the remaining territory which we believe should be protected, is in the direction of openness. I do not believe that anyone could seriously weigh those two marginal additions against the immense reductions which we propose in the scope of the present law. None could conclude that on balance we are extending or stiffening the law.

Parliament now has the best chance that it has ever had to put on the statute book a reasonable and effective new provision in place of section 2. I do not underestimate the difficulties, but I believe that success would bring a substantial reduction in the way that the criminal law bears on the media; an improvement in the reputation of the law, therefore better protection for information which has to be protected; and a gain in the quality of the workings of Government. We should not miss this chance. I hope and expect that this debate will take us another significant step towards reform.

10.8 am

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I have never had the pleasure of reading one of the Home Secretary's spy novels. However, I feel this morning that I have had taste of his style and I think that he created the title for his next work of fiction—"An Earthquake in Whitehall".

I want to begin with the Home Secretary's analysis of these matters. We cannot discuss the White paper without examining in a little detail the Home Secretary's statement on 29 June. In my 24 years as a Member of this House, I have never known a ministerial statement which was at greater variance with the White Paper that it purported to describe. I must tell the Home Secretary that either by inadvertance or intention he did the same this morning.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) asked the Home Secretary specifically about designation. The Home Secretary was explicitly and profoundly reassuring. He told his hon. Friend that designation was to be related to individuals. At which point a sigh of relief went round the House—at least among those hon. Members who have not read the White Paper, since the White Paper specifies groups. It is not possible to discuss these matters rationally if the Home Secretary does not answer questions with a degree of accuracy. That was the problem that the House faced a month ago.

Mr. Hurd rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Just one moment. The word "group" appears in the White Paper. As the Official Report will show, the Home Secretary said that it was limited to individuals.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is making a mountain out of a molehill. It is not possible to designate a group. Individuals must be designated. Individuals will be informed. There will not be a notice saying that that is a group which consists of such and such a category. Individuals will be designated and informed that they have been designated. That is the point.

Mr. Hattersley: I only wish that the Home Secretary had put that in his White Paper, paragraph 47 of which states:

"groups whose duties necessarily involve extensive familiarity with the work of the security and intelligence services" will be designated. The Home Secretary cannot say that his reply is consistent with what appears in the public text; nor were many of the things that he said in his statement on 29 June.

The Home Secretary rather foolishly said a moment ago that now that I have had an opportunity to read the White Paper, I may have a different view from that which I took on the day of the statement. He will recall that, thanks to his courtesy, I had an opportunity to read the White Paper during the morning of 29 June. He will also recall that other hon. Members were given a similar opportunity.

I hope that the Home Secretary will also recall that, with the exception of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), every hon. Member who had read the White Paper disputed the Home Secretary's description of it in his statement to the House. They disputed the notion that the White Paper dispelled the idea that the criminal law is being used to protect information simply because its disclosure would embarrass the Government.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)—who had read the White Paper—referred to paragraph 61 which rejected the idea that Crown servants prosecuted under the new Act could offer public interest as a defence and said that because that idea was not included, the White Paper was crucially flawed. The hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken)—who also had read the White Paper—urged other hon. Members to read it closely. He said that anyone who had read it would realise that it contained grave defects. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd)—who had read the White Paper—told the Home Secretary as I have told him this morning:

"the balance of his remarks is confounded by any reading of that paper."

The hon. Gentleman was referring to the White Paper. All those hon. Members disagreed, as I disagree, with the Home Secretary's key passage then and the tone of his speech today, that

"The scope of the legislation would be confined to the very small amount of information that it is in the whole nation's interest to keep secret."—[Official Report, 29 June 1988; Vol. 136, c. 365-71.]

Of course the White Paper proposals will release a huge area of Government information from the absurdities of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. However, in the areas where open and honest government are tested, the same old illiberal rules still apply, some with greater force and fewer safeguards. I believe that that can be demonstrated notwithstanding what the Home Secretary has said today.

The Home Secretary said that there is no blanket rule which requires any group or individual to remain silent on whole ranges of subjects. He based that assertion on a new concept which, as far as I can see, does not appear in the White Paper. That concept is "without authority". If the Home Secretary can tell me where that concept applies and where it is specified in the White Paper, I will gladly give way.

There are passages in the White Paper which, according to any moderate understanding of the English language, convey the opposite impression. There are categories where a blanket rule applies automatically and where the criminal sanction is automatically triggered simply by the giving out of information.

I will help the Home Secretary by quoting from the White Paper. Paragraph 38 states:

"The Government does not now propose that new legislation should make all such disclosures an offence."—

Bravo. It continues:

"It proposes instead that legislation should make a distinction between disclosures by members and former members of the security and intelligence services and disclosures by other persons; and that, in the latter case, the prosecution should have to show that the disclosure was likely to damage the operation of the security or intelligence services."

That does not apply in the former case. In that case, when officers or ex-officers of the security services, disclose information, the rule is absolute. The criminal sanction is automatic. There is no discretion or concept of "without authority". Exactly the same rule applies in paragraph 53. I must explain to the Home Secretary, because this is more important than his strange contextual errors, that even were the concept of "without authority" to apply, it would still make the proposed Bill unacceptable. We are arguing against the notion that the Government can decide by certification or other means what should and should not be published. "Without authority" means that it may be done if the Government agree.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: In a moment.

The Home Secretary is nodding. If he means that it may be done if the Government agree, he must understand that that is philosophically no different from certification. It is a negative form of certification and there is no philosophical difference between the two systems. I now give way to the Commissioner.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman must accept that he is on to a completely false point in suggesting that the concept of a distinction between authorised and unauthorised disclosure has no previous existence and cannot be found here. It has always existed in the law. If the right hon. Gentleman would care, for example, to consider paragraph 14 of the White Paper, he would see that it states:

"The central concern of any reform of section 2 is to determine in what circumstances the unauthorised disclosure of official information should be criminal."

That makes it absolutely clear that the concept of authorisation as limiting the scope of the operation of the criminal law, even where it would otherwise extend, has been part of the law and will continue to be so.

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not follow my point. Perhaps his mind is on other matters. The point is clear. If it is to be said that the security services are allowed to publish information with the Government's authorisation, we cannot rely any longer on the publicity about juries deciding and the matter not being in the Government's hands. The Government decide on individual cases. They decide yes or no. I do not disagree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that that has been the habit in the past, but the Home Seceretary claims that there should be a different habit in the future based on something more liberal and rational. Based on the Government's agreement and fiat, that makes it a system of certification by another name. The Government cannot deny that and nor has the Home Secretary done anything to disprove it.

Under paragraph 43, it is a criminal offence for any member of the security or intelligence services, past or present—or, under paragraph 45, anyone or group designated by a Minister as associated or in frequent contact with the security services—to say anything about security no matter how trivial, how true or how necessary in the public interest. If we say, "Don't worry about that because things which are right in the public interest, already known abroad or likely to cause no damage and which should be in the public weal, will be authorised," the Minister who replies had better tell me whether, under the new legislation, the publication of "Spycatcher" or Mr. Clive Ponting's revelation of the truth or what Miss Cathy Massiter said about the operation of the service would be authorised. Of course it would not. We are back in the old system under a liberal guise.

Many media reports, including a programme broadcast by the BBC at 2 pm yesterday, have announced that the new dawn prepared by the Home Secretary will result in the scrutiny by juries of all information published, if there is any dispute about its propriety. They have suggested that juries will decide whether publication has damaged the public interest. That is clearly not the case in the areas where there are likely to be disputes, where the arguments about publication are most important, and where the Government's illiberality is most often demonstrated. It becomes a criminal offence for intelligence and security personnel to say anything about intelligence or security. The power of ministerial designation, about which the Home Secretary did not reassure me this morning, allows the rule of absolute silence to be extended far beyond the bounds of the security services themselves.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): I believe that my right hon. Friend was in the House when the former Labour Member for Morpeth was prosecuted. Part of that trial was held in secret and part of it in public. To this day, hon. Members do not know whether he was prosecuted for giving away defence secrets or for disclosing commercial secrets. My suspicion is that his acquittal was due to the fact that there was a commercial issue involved. At that time, we thought that it was a most harsh decision to prosecute him. We never knew, and we still do not know, the facts of the case, which endorses my right hon. Friend's point. There should be more openness in that respect.

Mr. Hattersley: We all agree with that. Another example that has been brought to the attention of the House is one about which the Home Secretary or his junior Minister may care to speculate when replying to the debate. From time to time, we hear allegations—no more —that illegal phone taps are perpetrated by junior members of the security services. That was alleged in "Spycatcher", and it was alleged by Mr. Anthony Cavendish. It was alleged that some phone taps were applied to Members of the House. If an honest and honourable member of the security service discovers that that is happening, he is, as the Home Secretary states, entitled to go to his superior and say, "You shouldn't do that." If his superior is a man about whom he has doubts, he is entitled to go to a designated officer and say, "I am very worried about the illegality, criminality and treason that is being committed by the service". However, if he does not trust even the designated officer——

Mr. Hurd indicated dissent.

Mr. Hattersley: —or whoever it is that the Home Secretary thinks is in that position of trust and responsibility, and who the honourable man may believe is party to the illegality, and if he makes public the fact that the right hon. Mr. A or the hon. Mrs. B has had his or her phone tapped, is he not committing a criminal offence? The Home Secretary seems to be shaking his head.

Mr. Hurd: I must correct the right hon. Gentleman's confusion about the staff counsellor. He is not of course a member of the security service.

Mr. Hattersley: I thought that the Home Secretary wanted to make a serious point. Let me ask him again. If the man about whom I have just hypothesised says, "This right hon. Member is having his phone tapped and I propose making that scandal public," will he not automatically be committing a criminal offence, for which there is no defence on grounds of honesty, decency, openness, justice or public interest? The Home Secretary does not answer the serious question. The answer to the serious question shows that in those areas where it ought to be right and proper for a member of the service to expose what is going on, the so-called liberal proposals that the Home Secretary puts before the House will automatically make that officer, without any qualification, subject to criminal prosecution and a period of imprisonment.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): As a member of the NCU who has worked extensively in telephone exchanges, I can give my right hon. Friend the answer to his question. If an intercept is found, the person finding it will have no knowledge of who put it on. He may take the matter to his superior officer, who if necessary will refer him to the designated officer within the service. That officer is not a staff counsellor in the context given by the Home Secretary. The person finding the tap is not allowed to remove it unless he is instructed to do so. He will have no knowledge of whether a warrant was granted to put that tap on in the first place.

Mr. Hattersley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Although the Home Secretary remains silent—I had put to him what I thought was not a rhetorical question—I hope that when the junior Minister replies, he will address that point directly and explicity. That example seems to be at the heart of all that we are complaining about and of all that is wrong with the White Paper.

Mr. Allen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hattersley: Just this once, and then I must make some progress.

Mr. Allen: Assuming that an officer has taken to the staff counsellor a complaint or a potential allegation that his colleagues or superiors are subverting the elected

[Mr. Allen]

Government, what will the staff counsellor do? He will surely attempt to check whether there is any substance to it. If there are people in the security services willing to subvert a duly elected Government, the very life of any individual seeking to expose that particular plot would surely be at risk. There must be a longer stop than the staff counsellor in cases of high treason.

Mr. Hattersley: The long stop ought to have the right to publish the information and to defend the right to publish it, and the propriety of doing so, in court.

I move forward as speedily as I can to allow other hon. Members time to enter the debate.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that particular point?

Mr. Hattersley: No, I must go on, I have given way too much for the convenience of the House.

I reiterate that the two rules of automatic criminal sanction against officers nominated by the Government whenever they speak about matters relating to intelligence or security, and against any civil servant who reveals confidential information to a foreign power, are wrong in principle. They give the Government the right to maintain total silence in areas where more frankness is desperately needed. The Home Secretary misunderstands the whole philosophy of the argument if he imagines that he can defend the Government's position by saying, "See how much information of our choice and to our convenience we have chosen to give out." This argument is about whether the people and the courts of this country have the right to decide about disclosure of information that is not to the Government's convenience. That is the real principle, and it is intensely important in the record of this Government—which I thought the Home Secretary was pretty reckless to introduce into the debate.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: No, I have said that I must make progress. I cannot give way even for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Whitney: The right hon. Gentleman means especially for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hattersley: Yes, but not for the reason that he thinks.

It is particularly necessary to provide the added safeguard and a law that allows for openness to this Government on account of their record of wishing to maintain total secrecy with a determination that amounts to obsession. It is this Government who have unscrupulously used the courts to pursue cases that they knew they could not win, but which they knew that by expending enormous amounts of public money they could keep going for so long that they would damage at least the financial interests of the security officers they wished to pursue.

It is this Government who have prosecuted with mixed success civil servants who acted out of conscience in making public information that they knew was of no benefit to an enemy or potential enemy but they thought should not be kept secret. It is this Government who raided the BBC's Scottish studios, confiscated films, and then returned them without prosecution, explanation or apology. It is this Government who prohibited the publication of Anthony Cavendish's little booklet alleging Security Service treason against the Administration of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). I do not believe that the power to control information that is not likely to damage the national interest should be available to any Government, but certainly it ought not to be available to a Government having that sort of record of suppressing inconvenient information and of suppressing information that is in no way damaging to the national interest, but which the Government or the Prime Minister think ought to be suppressed.

The heart of the matter and the central issue that we are debating is the need, with any new law concerning official secrets, to take a rational and democratic view of the Security Service's operations. At present, the service acts either like a private army or like the private property of the Prime Minister. In other democracies, the activities of the security services come under the general supervision of Parliament. That rule should apply here. Until it does, the whole nexus between the wrong sort of secrecy and the wrong sort of activity will never be properly exposed.

Until that happens, it is intolerable that everything done by the security services—good or bad, legal or illegal, trivial or significant, in or against the public interest—should be cloaked in secrecy according to the fiat of the Government. But that is what the White Paper provides, and that is why the editor of The Observer—who knows about such matters, as he has been pursued by the Government—regards the proposed Act as in many ways worse than what it seeks to replace. For it specifically rules out—and what the Home Secretary says does not alter my view for a moment—some of the protections provided by the present law. I have no doubt that the defendant's protection of the public interest defence will be removed.

The Home Secretary says that no such defence exists. The fact is, however, that juries have acted on the belief that it does, or on the conviction that it should. Men and women have been acquitted on the belief that what they did was in the public interest. Let us assume that all that that reveals is that the present law is ambiguous, and that liberal-minded juries have chosen to interpret it in a certain way. What the Home Secretary now proposes is explicitly to remove that protection, so that juries will have no doubt in their minds in future. They will be directed that there is no such thing as a public interest defence; that loophole will be closed.

When I asked the Home Secretary a month ago whether various notorious prosecutions under the present Government—that of Mr. Ponting in particular—would have led under the proposed Act to an acquittal or a conviction, there was a roar of "Conviction" from his hon. Friends. Of course Ponting would have been convicted, because the White Paper rules out the concept of public interest and leaves that option no longer open to the Government.

Nor do I believe that the protection of prior publication will be protection that it is today. Let us again take the "Spycatcher" case. What would be the application of the new law to that? As I understand it, there is virtually no new information in "Spycatcher". There is certainly none of significance, and none that the Soviet Union does not already possess. Nevertheless, the Prime Minister has said from the Dispatch Box, in all our hearing, that whether the information is known does not matter. Prior publication is not the issue; it is security information. Would "Spycatcher" be released under the new legislation, as it should be, or would we continue to operate the principle that is so objectionable concerning all illiberal views on information? The Government's objection is not to information being made available to enemies or potential enemies of the state, but to its being made available to the people of this country. Much of the new legislation, like that which it is likely to replace, is intended to keep information not from enemies but from the British people.

Let me make it clear that I want to keep secret material that even might be of real benefit to an enemy or potential enemy. The House, I believe, is unanimous in that desire. But the Zircon issue, for instance, was brought to fever pitch and generated ministerial hysteria not because it would reveal anything to the Soviet Union, but because it might lead our friends and allies in the United States to believe that we did not have the grip on the security services that they expected of us. That does not strike me as a justification for an illiberal Official Secrets Act.

The proposed Act contains almost all the unhappy and unacceptable ingredients of the old Act, and the Act that the Home Secretary canvassed before his statement and then—consciously and with dramatic effect—announced that he would not apply: the Act that includes certification. The objection to certification is that it gives Governments and Ministers the right to designate individual pieces of information that can or cannot be published. What the White Paper now proposes is mass certification: the Government have the right to say that a certain category of persons is not allowed to publish. In the White Paper, they specify certain categories of information —information obtained in confidence from a foreign power; information related to defence matters, in some cases; and information concerning intelligence security.

The Home Secretary says—and his predecessor seemed to support him—that the Government would occasionally allow discretion, and that in his grace and favour a Home Secretary will read a book and then say that he does not mind its being published. I do not see how that can logically be separated from the idea of certification. If a Minister is to say, "This will not be tested in the courts: bring it to me and I will tell you whether it can be published", that is certification in all but name.

In all the Home Secretary's pronouncements—in his statement on the White Paper and in his speech today—he has made much of the need to remove from official secrets legislation matters of no danger or strategic significance. He wants us to concede that that has been done. Of course, in a sense I concede it willingly. I recall that in the January debate the Home Secretary scoffed, I thought rather artificially, at the absurdity of prosecuting—I quote his words exactly—

"civil servants who disclose the colour of the carpets in their offices or what was on the menu in the staff canteen."—[Official Report, 15 January 1988; Vol. 125, c. 581.]

Clearly such information is no longer subject to legal prosecution, and it is no doubt enormously gratifying to newspapers that wish to write about ministerial carpets and staff canteen menus that they can now do so with impunity. But, as he scoffed at the idea of such matters being considered under section 2, the Home Secretary went on to say that they are not subject to prosecution now. Many of the categories that he has said will no longer be subject to prosecution have not been subject to it in any case.

The idea that much sensitive Budget information can be published without any prosecution is one of which I need to be convinced. I was looking at the other legislation surrounding such matters—laws regarding trade statistics, confidentiality of business information and the exchange rate, with which I was once concerned in passing. Are we being told that the matters that the Chancellor discusses in purdah, or semi-purdah—purdah apart from information that it is authorised to leak—are not protected by any law? Or is it simply that the legal obligation to silence has been removed from the Official Secrets Act and applies with equal force elsewhere?

The attitude that has characterised the Opposition throughout the debate is our wish to see a tight, positive and effective control on information which, if published, might damage the interests of the country. But the White Paper goes much further. It suppresses what ought to be in the public domain. That is why we shall vote against the Bill unless it is radically altered. If it were only more like the Bill that the Home Secretary pretended would come about when he introduced the White Paper, and less like the White Paper, we might vote for it.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Listening to the speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), I could not help feeling that the disappointment that he showed when the Home Secretary made his statement had spilled over into this debate—disappointment that the draconian measures that he imagined would be introduced were not in the White Paper. Finding that they are not in the White Paper, he has had to spin a spurious web to try to persuade the House that the White Paper is not as it is. He has been wholly unsuccessful, and has simply brought about a series of misconceived red herrings.

Take, for example, authorisation, of which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has made such heavy weather. He is entirely wrong about that. The object of the exercise, following the recommendations of the Franks committee to reform the official secrets legislation, was to narrow the areas where disclosure would attract the sanctions of the criminal law. Over and above that, any conceivable reform must make it plain that other areas of the law would still be covered by the official secrets legislation and that disclosure would be a criminal offence. The Government must be able to prevent memoirs being published. It is a complete red herring for the right hon. Member to pretend that there is anything novel in that concept. For him to obscure that simple concept with the concept of ministerial certification is, at best, disingenuous and, at worst, something much more serious.

The ministerial certification concept is wholly different from authorisation. It is that, in the case of a prosecution brought before the courts in the ordinary way, where there is a specific issue that the court has to determine, the existence of a ministerial certificate shall be final and conclusive. That is quite different from the authorisation of material that is outside the realm of what is permitted by the criminal law. The right hon. Gentleman should see that distinction. I am surprised that he does not.

The White Paper amounts to a substantial liberalisation of the law. The right hon. Gentleman did less than justice to himself in his concluding remarks about Budget secrets. They were full of dark hints. He suggested that, although Budget secrets may not be covered by this legislation, something else, somewhere, is being introduced to cover that loophole. There is no truth in that suggestion. This is about the reform of the official secrets legislation. If the right hon. Gentleman has in mind other legislation that he thinks ought to be changed, he owes it to the House to say exactly what it is. But he has done nothing of the kind.

Mr. Hattersley: I am not talking about new legislation, darkly hinted at, or about Budget secrets that should be made available before the Budget. I am in favour of Budget secrets being kept secret, but I am not in favour of the Home Secretary pretending that they will not be kept secret when I think they will.

Mr. Brittan: It will not do for the right hon. Gentleman to make dark hints about unspecified legislation. If the right hon. Gentleman is making hints about future legislation, the House is entitled to know what those hints are. If it is existing legislation, it should be identified. The right hon. Gentleman has demeaned himself by doing neither.

The legislation envisaged by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary amounts to a substantial liberalisation of the law, but that does not imply that it is perfect, as I shall seek to show. I have criticisms and comments to make.

This legisation is well on the way to securing an objective that has been accepted in principle but that has eluded Governments for many years: effective protection for information, the disclosure of which would damage the national interest, while at the same time removing the cloak of the criminal law from a welter of information that might be embarrassing if disclosed but that is not contrary to the national interest.

Some of those who opposed suggested reforms in the past were genuinely unhappy with the proposals, but others preferred unworkable legislation. They hoped either that it could not be enforced or that a jury would not convict because the legislation had been discredited. Intellectually, that is a shoddy approach to the problem, although it did much to impede previous attempts at reform. This attempt has deservedly received a better reception than its predecessors. It is a better scheme than that put forward in the 1979 Bill, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on it. The proposals are ingenious and constructive, especially the way in which the problem of ministerial certification has been resolved by abolishing it altogether.

The extent of the liberalisation has not been fully appreciated. There has been a reduction in the number of categories covered by the criminal law. Furthermore, the requirement that the specific harm set out in the White Paper has to be proved will not make it at all easy to secure convictions, except in the clearest cases.

Paragraph 49 of the White Paper deals with defence. It proposes that the prosecution should be obliged to prove "that the disclosure was likely either to prejudice the capability of the armed forces to carry out any of their defence tasks, or to lead to a risk of loss of life, injury to personnel or damage to equipment or installations, or to prejudice dealings between the Government and the government of another state or an international organisation."

It is not difficult to see that an ingenious defence would be able to use those words to show that the prosecution had not made out its case, except in the clearest possible cases of damaging disclosure.

However, there is still scope for considerable discussion of what the definitions of specific harm in the various areas should be and the circumstances in which it is appropriate for no harm test to be required. I have three points to make about that. The first relates to paragraph 49 on defence and paragraph 50 on international relations. The specific harm that the Government have to prove is that disclosure would prejudice dealings between the Government and the Government of another state or an international organisation. The comparable paragraph in the 1979 Bill used language that required proof of serious injury. The difference is important.

Generally, the specific harm that the Government have to prove in this White Paper is meant to be less vague and more specific than the present legislative provisions. The justification of the approach of abandoning specification and setting out, with limited exceptions, the specific harm that has to be proved is to require something more concrete that is fit to come before a jury. I could understand something that was more specific, but to confine the prosecution to having to prove that the material that is disclosed merely prejudices dealings is a test as vague as the requirement of serious harm. It is also more restrictive. It would be easier to prove that the material that is disclosed prejudices something than that it does serious harm. As at present advised, I do not see any justification for what amounts to a tightening up of proposals that were originally put forward in 1979.

The second point to which I should like to draw attention relates to an important ambiguity that needs to be cleared up about paragraphs 41 and 42 of the White Paper, in which it is said that in the case of disclosure by members or former members of the security and intelligence services there will be no need to prove any specific harm. That is the distinction between disclosures by members or former members of the security and intelligence services and disclosures by others. But what about disclosures by newspapers of material emanating from members of the security and intelligence services? If the harm test were required in such a case, the law would undoubtedly be tighter, if enacted on the lines of the White Paper, than might have seemed apparent from a cursory reading of the White Paper. The paragraph refers simply to disclosure of information by members or former members of those services. It does not refer to information derived from disclosure by members or former members of those services. That is an important matter which needs to be clarified.

If no harm test is required, the law is tighter than it might have seemed. If the harm test is required, the total ban on the disclosure by officers of the security and intelligence services is considerably diluted. I have an open mind about what is right, but I think that it should be clarified before the House is invited to consider the matter further.

My third point relates to paragraph 51, which provides the blanket coverage of the criminal law on information obtained in confidence from other Governments or international organisations. In the case of such disclosure, the White Paper proposes that there should be no requirement for any specific harm test to be covered. I should be very surprised if the House were ultimately to be persuaded of the need for any such category, and certainly of the need for it to be covered by a blanket ban, there being no need to prove any harm.

Some of the information derived from other Governments and international organisations is, frankly, highly trivial. Some of the information derived from other Governments and international organisations in confidence is material which, under the law of those countries, it is not a crime to publish abroad. It seems to me excessively sweeping and unnecessary to contain paragraph 51, particularly when it is read in conjunction with paragraph 50—the paragraph on international relations—which already provides that it shall be a criminal offence if the Government can prove that will prejudice dealings between the Government and the Government of another state or an international organisation. If the disclosure of information communicated in confidence by such a Government or international organisation does any harm at all, it will not be difficult to prove that prejudice, and it is quite unnecessary to have the category in paragraph 51.

Those seem to be the real questions which must be asked and the potential blemishes which must be considered, rather than the spurious smokescreen which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook erected. As for general public interest defence, I find myself persuaded by what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary says. It seems to me irrelevant, with all due respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken), to say what the precise state of the law is as to the existence or otherwise of a public interest defence. It is plainly fairly ambiguous and uncertain. The right question to ask is whether such a defence is necessary and desirable.

The question has been circumvented by the Government's approach. They have said that they will require the prosecution to prove a specific harm except in certain other limited cases, and they will define that harm. The nature of the argument about public interest is circumscribed by the definition. The proper question is whether the definition is right or wrong. I have expressed, with regard to the use of the word "prejudice", my reservations about one respect of the definition. That seems to be the proper area for debate, rather than the general question whether public interest defences should apply. That seems to be addressing a question which has been removed by the wholly different intellectual concept of the White Paper.

The Government have made out their case in regard to the prior publication of disclosure. They have argued—in my view rightly—that whereas in many cases the fact that there has already been publication would enable the defence to show that the prosecution has not discharged the burden of establishing specific harm, there may be circumstances in which obscure, partial publication elsewhere does not mean that there is no harm by a more substantial or authoritative disclosure identified as coming from the intelligence services. The balance is right.

The most difficult question is whether there is justification for members of the intelligence and security services being under an absolute and lifelong ban from making disclosures without authority. I have come to the conclusion that that general principle—I stress the words "general principle"—is unexceptionable and correct. People who take on the job of working in the security and intelligence services know exactly what they are doing and the nature of the work they are undertaking. I think that it is reasonable that they should not generally be allowed to publish material without the risk of criminal prosecution.

If we are talking about historical material, there is and always has been provision for authorisation, contrary to the impression given by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. There is, however, something to be said for introducing an independent element in the procedure of vetting material for publication. There is also something to be said for no longer confining that process to the service. That is no reason why there should not be people of responsibility and authority from outside the service who could be involved in vetting material for publication.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: Would my right hon. and learned Friend care to comment on whether former or serving intelligence service officers should have the right to plead inequity as a defence?

Mr. Brittan: I was coming to that.

Finally, but most important, is the question what should happen if an intelligence officer discovers, or thinks that he has discovered, serious misconduct. Attention has been drawn to the fact that such a person can go to his superior, but attention has also been drawn to the existence of Sir Philip Woodfield's position as staff counsellor, to whom a person in such circumstances can turn.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has not given sufficient weight to the novelty of this departure from previous practice and the importance of there being someone completely outside the service to whom an officer can turn. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that an officer may not have confidence in such a person, but it is possible for an officer to have confidence in nobody. No Government can do more than provide a person of repute and integrity such as all who know him would testify Sir Philip Woodfield to be.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. Brittan: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would care to listen for a moment before intervening. I regard the present arrangement for a staff counsellor as something to be built on, not something that is wholly sufficient. It is essential that there should be something rather more substantial than this informal, ad hoc appointment. There should be a formally established and publicly announced—and explained—independent system within the public service for examining allegations of impropriety. Although such a system would have to operate in private, its existence could be announced publicly, as could details about it. That would do more than anything else to persuade Parliament that it is right to impose the sanctions of the criminal law for life on people in the security and intelligence services who are found guilty of unauthorised disclosure of material, whatever their motives and whatever the circumstances.

10.59 am

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I am very glad to have the chance of following the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). Many of us must have noted, particularly in view of the rumours published in the newspapers recently, how passionately he opposed the particular part of the Government's proposed legislation which might interfere with international communications. I hope that that does not mean that he has accepted the new job. Some of us consider that he was most ill-used during the Westland affair. I do not know whether he will take any advice from me on these matters, but my advice is: stick it out; she will not be there for ever.

One of the most excruciating moments ever reported to the House was when Sir Robert Armstrong allegedly went to the Prime Minister and reported, under the inquiry that he carried out, that someone in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Department had been responsible for the leak. I have always thought that that must have been an amazing moment. The Prime Minister must have said, "No, not our Leon. He would not do anything without consulting me." I have always thought that we should have heard such a response from the Prime Minister at the time.

I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not depart, as we value his contribution to ensuring that we get a better Bill than the White Paper.

It would be a special irony indeed if at the end of this week, when, quite properly in my opinion, we have been asserting the supremacy of Parliament as vindicated and established in the 1688 and 1689 revolution, which I still believe was a glorious revolution, we should support a White Paper which involves the derogation from that supremacy of Parliament, particularly in the light of the large-scale misdemeanours of the secret service which have been revealed in recent years. If anyone claims that I am exaggerating, I commend them to the excellent article by Lord Hailsham, written soon after he left the position of Lord Chancellor. A few months ago, he wrote an article for The Independent, entitled

"How the security services are bound by the rule of law."

I think that the headline may have been written by the excellent sub-editors of The Independent, but the article was written by the Lord Chancellor himself.

In that article he wrote that one of the reasons why the Bill of Rights had been passed and approved on such a scale—and one of the reasons why I am in favour of celebrating these matters—was the antics of James II, which he described as:

"The ill-advised and illegal attempts by James II to evade the contraints of the doctrine."

In other words, James II was engaged in what might be described in modern times as spycatcher activities. In those days the very proper remedy of 1688 and 1689 was to reassert the power, authority and control of Parliament, in particular the House of Commons. That is what we should be doing this week, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said at the end of his notable speech today. We really need to bring back the influence and the control of Parliament.

I presume that it is not discussed or even mentioned in the White Paper because the Prime Minister always lays down the rule that we cannot discuss the possibilities of parliamentary control, which is the normal way in which this country deals with grave misdemeanors. It cannot be applied here because, as the Prime Minister often says, the secret service must be kept secret, and that is the end of the matter.

I imagine that if any Minister were to dare to go along to any of the discussions on the Bill and say, "What about establishing some parliamentary control over this matter?" the whole question would be ruled out from the beginning. Some may say that it is because of the tradition of this country, although, as I said, Lord Hailsham accepts a different doctrine, announced in the article, that Parliament does have some control, and that when a Minister, an Attorney-General or a Home Secretary comes to the House and speaks from the Dispatch Box about how the secret service is operating, that in itself is an admission of parliamentary control. Even when in the usual circumstances, the Prime Minister, the Attorney-General or the Home Secretary says, "We cannot answer these questions because we do not answer security questions in public", Lord Hailsham's doctrine is different. He says that the fact that the Ministers have to come to the House means that they are answerable to the House, and therefore the House has the right and the duty to press the matter further so that we have some proper parliamentary control.

If it is said in 1988, of all years, that we cannot have proper parliamentary control, we should consider what happens in the United States of America. After the earth-shattering experiences on the other side of the Atlantic, I have not heard that the President of the United States is proposing to give up his secret service or to abandon having a secret service—nothing of the kind. However, in the past year, the affairs of the American secret service have been ransacked by Congress in more detail than almost ever before in history. There have been previous occasions, but on this occasion its investigations went further than ever before on a matter of supreme importance about which the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister ought to be paramountly concerned.

International terrorism is one of the appalling horrors of the modern age and how to deal with it is one of the questions that affects the operation of the secret service. That is one reason why Congress has insisted on all these matters being dragged out in public. They discovered that the secret agents of the American Government were engaged in actions with terrorists and were trying to make deals with terrorists quite contrary to all the professions that they had made to the world and which had been supported strongly by our own Prime Minister. Indeed, no one has been more passionate than she in saying how strongly she agrees with President Reagan when he denounces terrorism. But when the agents of President Reagan engage in activities to sell arms or to assist terrorists or terrorists regimes, and when all that is dragged out in the sight of the world, as it has been during the past few months, the Prime Minister is a little more reticent, and we have not heard exactly what she thinks about it.

I believe, and most sensible people would believe, that whatever it may mean to the American security services —although I think that it is better for them too—for American democracy and for the free world of which we are members, it is a very good thing it has all been brought out and that those infamies have not been tolerated.

I do not know whether other hon. Members feel as strongly as I do, but if it is true that it was absolutely essential for these misdemeanours, horrors, misdeeds and contemplated misdeeds to be brought out into the open by the action of the American Congress, I consider that a British parliamentary committee of some sort should have the power to do something similar. I am not saying that we should mimick or adopt the American methods. We have our own methods of establishing a parliamentary Committee to survey these matters.

In the light of all that has happened and all that has been revealed during the past few months, it is monstrous that today we should be presented with a White Paper which does not contain any proposal whatsoever for extending parliamentary control over such matters.

I now turn to a question about which I have had quite a lot of correspondence with the Prime Minister—the revelations in the book "Spycatcher". I am not saying that "Spycatcher" is a great book or a work of art. In many ways, I consider that it is a work of infamy and I certainly do not believe that many parts of it can be believed unless some corroborative evidence can be produced. I certainly think that the person responsible for writing that book was guilty of a gross breach of faith, not only to his obligations but to many of the people he attacked. It is scandalous that Sir Roger Hollis should be denounced, defamed and held up in history as a man who was a traitor to his country on evidence that has not been sifted at all. I know that we cannot protect the dead, but it is pretty thick that that should have happened. On one occasion the Prime Minister tried to repudiate it, but she should have carried it a bit further. If I had been a relation of Sir Roger Hollis I would have been outraged at what was done. A former prominent Conservative Member was the brother of Sir Roger Hollis and if he had been here he would have raised a storm about what was permitted by the Government.

Under the present arrangements there are listed leakages to particular journalists—to Chapman Pincher in particular. I do not know whether there will be a special Chapman Pincher clause in the Bill. Such a clause may say that as long as material is leaked to Chapman Pincher it will be all right and there will be no prosecution. Would the Chapman Pincher clause include a few other journalists as well because there seems to be some discrimination? I am sorry that none of the Law Officers are present because they are the people who are supposed to pick and choose between the Cavendishes and the Chapman Pinchers and would have to say who was to be prosecuted. This is an important matter.

I shall now come to what has been revealed and about which I had correspondence with the Prime Minister. I wrote to her about the so-called revelations in "Spycatcher" about the attempts to destabilise the Wilson Government, which was obviously the major matter, and asked if they were true or had any basis. But there was another series of revelations. If they are correct they raise questions of first-class importance to the existence and continuance of our democracy. They are questions about the allegations that the British secret service was preparing for the assassination of President Nasser. If it so engaged, that was serious, because if the attempt had succeeded the consequences for our country because of the reactions throughout the whole of the middle east would have been grave. Anybody who knows anything about the middle east knows the reputation that President Nasser had. I took that view about the consequences when I first read this tale about the British secret service having been engaged in these activities.

John Donaldson, now Lord Donaldson of Lymington, was not my favourite judge because I had a few brushes with him in times gone by. However, what he said about this matter is of great importance. He said that the so-called plan to assassinate President Nasser was "iniquity of a high order—a monstrous thing and a stain on this country's honour."

If somebody discovers that our secret service has engaged in such activities, what would be his obligation to reveal it under the present proposals? If there is a stain on our country's honour is some member of the secret service to say, "I must not take any steps to reveal that because I am bound by the same provision."

In the same discussion on these matters Lord Donaldson went on to speak about the absurdity of the doctrine that if the secret service was engaged in acts of such gross iniquity, that was all the more reason for matters to be suppressed. That is a very strange doctrine. Some of us take a simpler view. To introduce the idea that one must never reveal what would involve a stain on our country's honour is almost to introduce the Nuremburg concept that one must not reveal anything and does not have any obligation apart from a signed obligation to the state. As some hon. Members have said, juries have taken a similar view in previous cases. If Ministers have their way, that loophole will be closed. Juries have a somewhat different view from that of the Government about what is right and proper for the country to do, and this case is a clear example of that.

I wrote to the Prime Minister on two or three occasions asking whether she would be good enough to tell me whether she ever inquired into the accuracy of this case. I did that because she told the House on one occasion that she had had a new inquiry into the so-called destabilisation of the Wilson Government. On many occasions she spoke about the investigation initiated by my right hon. Friend who was the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. He did have an investigation, but I do not know whether it covered all these matters. The Prime Minister said in the letter to me, and told the House, that she had carried out a fresh investigation into these matters. Is that the case? Perhaps the Minister will tell us, but I doubt it because he would have to go and ask the Prime Minister and she would not be in too good a temper if the question were put to her point blank. If an investigation was carried out, did it cover the question which Lord Donaldson said:

"involved iniquity of a high order—a monstrous thing"?

Will we be told by the Prime Minister that it happened a long time ago and we do not need inquiries into such things? Will she say that these are ancient matters, all gone and finished? Will she say that we must restore confidence in the present secret service and that those matters have nothing to do with today's affairs?

Things are very different with this Government. These matters are not out of date and are not ancient questions. They are as up to date, shall we say, as the shootings in Gibraltar. The secret service is involved in that. One of the most extraordinary developments in that connection was the precipitant way in which the Prime Minister told the House that she would not have any special inquiry and certainly no parliamentary inquiry. Right at the beginning my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said that we must have an investigation because that was the best thing for Parliament, democracy and the secret service. The Prime Minister brushed all that aside. She said that she would not have an inquiry. She did not want Parliament interfering in any shape or form. She was landed with the much more difficult situation.

There will be an inquest at which nobody knows exactly who will appear or even how the evidence is to be taken. However the inquest goes, it will be very difficult for it to establish in the eyes of the world a full and proper judgment on the whole affair. That is especially so because one of the most scandalous aspects of the Gibraltar affair was what happened a few days later when the news was coming out. What happened a few days later can all be checked from the newspapers. Witnesses were brought forward as if they were witnesses of the event. When matters of that importance were published in the newspapers, a deluge of vilification and defamation was dished out against those witnesses or possible witnesses. Some of that deluge came from No. 10 Downing street.

If the Home Secretary disputes what I say he can look it up in the Sunday Times which, I suppose, is the most elevated section of the Murdoch press. The newspaper said that the material came from "higher sources". I do not think that it mentioned the No. 10 Downing street machine in that case, but that certainly came out. I do not know whether libel actions will be taken by those witnesses or about the chances that they would have in such actions.

We have the combination of a Prime Minister who says, "We will not have any investigation whatever on any parliamentary judgment on these events", and a highly suspicious Downing street machine that pours out material suitable to the Prime Minister. If it was poured out a way that was unsuitable to the Prime Minister its author would be unlikely to last very long. I have no hesitation in saying—neither did my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook—that the problems derive from the Government's behaviour.

We know that there are many problems that are not simple to solve. The Home Secretary said that he will settle the problems, but I do not believe that he has a chance of doing so if he does not secure the support of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman had wanted a settlement he should have given a much better welcome to the Protection of Official Information Bill introduced by his hon. Friend the minister for Aldridge—Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and to all the work that he has done since. The House and all those who believe in freedom of information owe the hon. Gentleman a debt of gratitude for the way in which he pursued his campaign. If the Government had any sense, they would have consulted him so as to achieve a Bill that would command the attention of the House. They will not do so by the proposals that they have presented.

I have no doubt that the relationship between the Prime Minister's Office and the nation is—I use the word deliberately—corrupt. I do not mean corrupt in the way that Malcolm Muggeridge used it. His definition of the word "corrupt" was when money passed. Favours pass between the Government machine, the No. 10 Downing street machine and the hugely elaborate Murdoch press, the power of which is far greater than that which a single newspaper proprietor should hold in a democratic society. The relationship between the Prime Minister's Office and those newspapers is evil and corrupt and the many problems will not be solved until the House has the courage to establish its own authority. It would be the best way of celebrating the revolution of 1688, which was important in the history of our country. Even what Lord Hailsham wrote about it was quite correct. It is necessary that the rule of law is established.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the Home Secretary or anybody else could not deny that over the past weeks and months we have heard accumulated evidence about how the secret services have defied and broken the rule of law with impunity. The Prime Minister has said, "There will be no parliamentary inquiry and we shall introduce a Bill that takes no account of these questions". If the Home Secretary makes himself a party to that, the Bill should be treated not only with opposition but derision.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): The House holds that there are certain important liberties and rights consonant with democracy. Among them are freedom of speech and of the press. A democracy cannot identify itself as such without them. The protection of certain information in the interests of all our citizens is important. When we consider a change in the law about the protection of official information, we must try to strike a balance between those competing interests. It must be a substantial argument that gainsays freedom of speech or of the press. We need freedom of speech and of the press to identify the activities of Government. That is the only way in which we can hold them accountable. If we do not know what they are doing, how do we hold them accountable? In that spirit, one approaches the White Paper.

I have some sympathy with the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who said he found it difficult to reconcile the words of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in his original introduction of the White Paper with some of the words that he used today. I shall give the reasons why I also have difficulty in that regard. If the Home Secretary were saying, "I shall approach the appropriate bull points as I can identify them, but nevertheless, caveat emptor," that would be perfectly reasonable. My right hon. Friend, however, went further than that, and I shall try to diagnose why we should be wary of any salesman—whether it be an insurance salesman or any other—who wants to identify the most marketable aspects of his proposals. It is my job, as the prospective purchaser of the White Paper, to identify omissions, absences or matters that are not in my interest.

The matter is approached by trying to identify two classes of information: those that are absolute—I know that my right hon. Friend backed away from the concept of absolute defences—and those that have a limited damage test, over which the prosecution would merely have to skip. I take to heart the remarks of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) that "prejudice" and "damage" are low-level words that do not pose a serious test to the prosecution when a penalty of up to two years' imprisonment is involved.

The first absolute category is paragraph 51 of the White Paper, which refers to paragraph 28 and makes slight reference to paragraphs 26 and 27. It relates to information obtained in confidence from Governments and international organisations. When the Home Secretary originally introduced this paragraph, he said that he did not expect to carry me with him and that I had raised an important but limited point. How limited or small is this point? There is little argument about why paragraph 51 is necessary.

In that paragraph, the Government say:

"There is a wider damage to the standing of the United Kingdom in relation to all governments and international organisations. For that reason any unauthorised disclosure is harmful, and the Government sees no purpose in setting a test of harm which is bound to be satisfied in every instance."

The sheer assertiveness of that is breathtaking. It lacks rational justification, or an attempt to discover in what way it should be limited or whether it is compatible with the rights of hon. Members, representing their constituents, to be able to hold the Government to account for proposals, measures or actions that they take in the name of the British people. That is what we are trying to examine.

The introduction of international organisations makes the scope of paragraph 51 enormous. No serious injury or damage test is to be applied. There is a pure assertion that everything nominated in this category is an absolute offence. I cannot understand the need for the comprehensiveness of the paragraph, and if one asks the Foreign Office to list or identify international organisations or activities that might lead to a punishment of up to two years' imprisonment, it grandly replies that it would "not be practicable" to tell the House of Commons.

"Not be practicable" to tell us what is a criminal offence or what may give rise to criminal behaviour? That is irresponsible, and if that is the spirit in which Whitehall approaches the matter—by announcing nostrums of such breathtaking wideness and saying that it cannot identify offences because it is not practicable—it is absurd. I agree entirely with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks that paragraph 51 should be dropped.

What does the paragraph do to journalists. It makes that which is lawful to report today unlawful to report after this measure is passed by the House. That aspect needs careful scrutiny. In a White Paper, I look for a balance between the overriding considerations of the need to protect certain information and the rights of free expression, for people to know information and for the press to print it. There is no balance. Journalists are referred to in paragraphs 54 and 64, and there is almost no way out of the liability of disclosure of provisions. In paragraph 54, the Government assert:

"The Government accordingly proposes that the unauthorised disclosure by any person of information in the specified categories"—

hon. Members should remember that the specified categories contain no damage test—

"in circumstances where harm is likely to be caused should be an offence."

Paragraph 55 says:

"it would not be right to make disclosure criminal except where the discloser knows or can reasonably be expected to know that the disclosure would be likely to cause harm."

That might sound like a let-out, but the press cannot argue that it does not know that it is an absolute category. It is the law of the land and the press must be informed. It says, absolutely, that damage has taken place. Therefore, what argument can there be as to whether it has or has not taken place? It is an absolute assertion in law.

That is why there is some merit in what the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said, in that one does not need ministerial certificates. We have done away with them. We have instructed the court that any release of information under that category is a crime. I am not legally qualified like the former Home Secretary, but a judge can instruct a jury as to the law. The question can be asked, "Did the offence take place within the category of information given in confidence by a foreign Government?" The answer is yes. The question then is, "What pleadings can be made?" The answer is none. It is yes or no.

Where is the defence? We have ruled out the defence of prior publication, the fact that it has been previously available, and we have ruled out an iniquity defence. We do not need a ministerial certificate, because it has been asserted before a court. One cannot even look at the contention that there is damage, because no damage is required under that category. It has to be treated cautiously because it is closing down information that may be available to us today.

Let us look at the most sensitive type of information that the Government have a duty to protect and about which they are anxious. The Trevi agreement was leaked in The Independent. There was nothing outrageous in the document. It seems fairly sensible and contains nothing that one could not second-guess if one were a terrorist. I suppose it was information given in confidence between intergovernmental organisations—a phrase that would cover the Ghana cocoa marketing board. The information may have been leaked by an Italian or German Minister. I am not trying to say that a particular country is prone to such leaks. The information may be reported in Corriere Della Sera, Il Tempo or a Belgian newspaper, and a British journalist based in Milan may be asked to provide information on that for his newspaper. As I read the White Paper, he has no defence if he does so. He has committed an offence. It was information improperly disclosed, given in confidence between intergovernmental organisations, not necessarily Governments.

It is an outrageous category and it shows the spirit of those behind it, who did not try to weigh up what is appropriate in the great contest between our right to be able to express ourselves freely and the need to protect what we accept needs to be protected.

The second all-embracing category deals with security and intelligence matters and it is linked to interception. I want to deal with the quality of the arguments. There is an extraordinary argument in paragraph 53. I ask the House to reflect on the nature of people who put together arguments such as that. It makes its assertions, as we have come to expect from the White Paper and it says that no information obtained by means of interception can be disclosed without assisting terrorism or crime, damaging national security or "seriously breaching the privacy of private citizens."

What happens is that someone says, "My phone has been tapped. I am outraged and I want to tell the world." He would be told, "Oh no, you would commit an absolute offence because you would be invading your own privacy." The argument is contorted. Perhaps I have misread it and I am happy to give way to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary if he will explain how I would breach my own privacy. That is one of the assertions made in the White Paper. That is why I ask the House to look cautiously at everything.

The section dealing with security services affects every Government because they are responsible for them.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): If an individual thinks that his telephone is being tapped and wishes to make use of the Interception of Communications Act 1985, that could not be an offence under any circumstances because it does not involve official information.

Mr. Shepherd: If that is true, why does the White Paper make the assertion that to reveal such a thing would be damaging or would seriously breach the privacy of a private citizen? Perhaps I am misreading the White Paper?

The Government propose to make disclosure by members and former members of the security and intelligence services an absolute offence. That was a contention fought for by Sir Robert Armstrong in the High Court. It is worth remembering the words of Mr. Justice Scott in dealing with it:

"Sir Robert would not accept that any freedom of speech or of publication should be permitted so as to allow any information about the Security Service to be discussed publicly by an insider. No question of balance between the proper requirements of national security, on the one hand, and of freedom of speech or of the press on the other hand, arose. I found myself unable to escape the reflection that the absolute protection of the Security Services that Sir Robert was contending for could not be achieved this side of the Iron Curtain."

That is what the Government propose to legislate to accomplish. We should see it off.

We have to look carefully at the relationship between the duties. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) identified that when dealing with iniquity. The learned judge went on:

"It is not in dispute that Mr. Wright was under a duty of confidence by reason of his employment in MI5; nor is it in dispute that his duty continued after his resignation. The duty, if not contractual, is a duty recognised and imposed by equity, co-extensive with the duty that would have been imposed by implied term had the relationship been contractual. The breadth and duration of the duty that binds ex officers of MI5 depends, in my judgment, as does the breadth and duration of the duty of confidence in any other context, on all the circumstances of the case. The requirements of national security and the need for secrecy about the affairs of personnel of MI5 are of great weight indeed. But the breadth and duration of the duty cannot, nonetheless, be divorced from the circumstances of the particular case. Mr. Alexander"— counsel representing the Government—

"submitted that there was, where the duty of confidence of an ex-MI5 officer was concerned, no baiance to be struck. The duty of confidence applied, he said, to all information, however apparently trivial and however much, by reason of disclosures made by others, the information might have become publicly known. I am unable to accept that such an extreme, absolute approach is correct."

"The proposition may be tested by a number of examples, some more fanciful than others. Sir Percy Sillitoe's autobiography was published with the permission of the authorities. It contained information about the workings of MI5. Could it be argued that, notwithstanding the publication of the autobiography, other MI5 officers were under a duty not to disclose the information therein contained? I think not."

I accept that those are the personal views of a judge, expressed obiter dicta in court. If the authorities refuse to draw any line, they mistake the nature of the duty of confidence they seek to enforce. That says it all about the Government's approach. They do not try to draw any line, they include everything—the gold watch presented, the high crime of iniquity. What were the challenges of iniquity? They were the destabilisation of a legitimately elected British Government. That concerns every citizen. Every court that it has come before has accepted that that is so primary in a democracy that it could never be suppressed. In the Government's White Paper there is no intention that any such challenge should ever emerge into the public arena. There is also the contention that we tried to assassinate the Head of another state. That was referred to by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent. That would be a crime of infamy that would bring great shame upon this country.

Those are matters of major public policy, but the White Paper asserts that they should not be matters for us to discuss. It says that it would be improper and could cause damage. Damage to whom? The White Paper will damage us as a public forum and as a nation that is wedded to democracy. From 1688 to 1889, we required no official secrets Acts in the form we have and we rose to a great empire. In 1889 we introduced a public interest defence that information could be communicated to the authorities. In 1911 that was considerably watered down but still existed. In 1988 we are proposing that the public interest defence should go out of the window. We are proposing that prior publication should not be available.

The courts also had a view about prior publication, but I shall first quote again from Mr. Justice Scott:

"Mr. Alexander submitted that the Government ought not to be exposed to the pressure and embarrassment that mischievous and untrue allegations by insiders might produce. I accept that pressure and embarrassment might follow upon the reporting of allegations of the sort I am considering. But there are two answers, in my view, to Mr. Alexander's point. The first is that the legitimate purpose of the duty of confidence imposed on members and ex-members of MI5 is to preserve the secrecy of MI5's affairs and thereby to enable it to operate efficiently. The purpose is not to save the Government of the day from pressure or embarrassment. Second, and more important, the ability of the press freely to report allegations of scandals in government is one of the bulwarks of our democratic society. It could not happen in totalitarian countries. If the price that has to be paid is the exposure of the government of the day to pressure or embarrassment when mischievous of false allegations are made, then, in my opinion, that price must be paid."

That is my opinion as well. We suffer some loss of confidentiality and of security because we are a democracy, but this is a very small price to pay when one weighs up the great splendour of the fact that we are a democracy.

The White Paper makes no reference to the lawful or proper duties of the security services and the intelligence gatherers at GCHQ. Those were set down in the Maxwell Fyfe declaration, and were clearly identified and big enough topics. The White Paper does not even try to focus an absolute form of protection onto those necessary activities that are lawfully identified by a former Home Secretary. I would have thought that that may have been a starting point, but if the Government's position is that, at the end of the day, there is a class of information, that, through understandable difficulties in proving the damage in court, would expose us to the risk of greater damage, perhaps the answer to that is the contrived one that came from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn), a former Solicitor-General for Scotland. It is that, before a prosecution goes forward, where there is any suggestion that there is an abolute area —that is, no defence such as public interest, or prior publication can be raised—that should be looked at by an independent body.

In one respect, I do not go along with the argument of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), the former Home Secretary. That body could give the public the confidence that this is not a wilful, capricious or politically motivated or directed prosecution but one that has satisfied people of experience, who are independent of the Executive and secure, and who are confident, that the case has met what was originally in Franks, the serious injury test—not just no injury or an assumption of injury. This whole measure should be informed with the concept, right through it, that where we are proposing to send fellow citizens to prison, they must have caused a serious injury.

I genuinely believe, along the lines adopted by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) that this White Paper is fatally flawed in the absence of the public interest defence. It is counter-productive to argue that information that is freely available around the world could lead to criminal prosecution and the possibility of imprisonment here in our country.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. Difficult as it may be to limit the time taken by speeches on a subject such as this, I make a strong appeal to hon. Members. There is a great deal of interest, and I hope to be able to call all hon. Members who wish to speak.

11.43 am

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 deserves no more than a rapid cremation. Instead, we are having a requiem in which we are seeing created, as the section is laid to rest, a new and harsh successor to it. It is one that was falsely trailed by the Home Secretary in his statement, which bears little relation to the White Paper. The grief that we feel is not at the passing of section 2 but that what is offered is, first, so harsh and, secondly, so limited. It is limited in that it plays no part in the creation of a code of freedom of information. If there is one thing that could improve the image of our democracy for the public it would be to see through such a code that the Government are, at last, being made accountable and are being seen to be accountable.

The legislation that will repeal and replace section 2 should be no more than part of a much wider package. The motto of that package should be "Government are accountable". The Government have had nine years in which to produce new legislation. They have produced a reform so limited that they have wasted an opportunity. If Governments are to be accountable, we must accept that the whistle must be blown and it should be heard to be blown when there is a scandal in Government that should be exposed in the public interest. The words of Mr. Justice Scott, quoted by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) at great length, are words that demonstrate that members of the judiciary, at the highest level, believe that there must be room for the whistle to be blown on Government. Mr. Justice Scott would not—it would not be his style—use words such as "whistle-blowing", but he meant the same thing when he said that the press has a legitimate role in disclosing scandals in Government, and that open democratic society requires that that should be so. He said:

"the ability of the press freely to report allegations of scandals in government is one of the bulwarks of our democratic society."

For that bulwark to mean anything, as Mr. Justice Scott pointed out, the press must be free and it must be free sometimes to report what are no more than allegations based upon reasonable suspicion and evidence. In that context, I shall return later to the question whether there should be a public interest defence or what the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills calls an "iniquity defence" which may be more accurate.

Some of the proposals are welcome. I welcome the restriction to six of the categories of protected information. I welcome anything that draws some of the draconian breath of a section 2 that was enacted in a panic and has been repented at great length. It is welcome that ministerial certificates are not to be the determining factor. However, we are presented with a new and insidious alternative to such certificates. It is described as designation. Designation will be a flexible weapon in the hands of a Government. If we are ever unfortunate enough to have a truly unscrupulous Government, it will be an exceedingly flexible weapon. It is clearly open to abuse, as the very fact of designation will be protected, too. Therefore, the designated person will not be able to blow the whistle even to the extent of saying that he has been designated and, therefore, what comes from his category of work is designated. I suspect that the time may well come when every tight corner will be a designated area. The House should not be prepared to accept that when we come to scrutinise and debate the legislation.

With your injunction in mind, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall now deal briefly with a number of the specifics in the White Paper. I agree with the proposition that there ought to be an obligation of absolute secrecy on public servants in the unusual category that has been discussed at great length in recent months. However, we must not simply close the door on public interest by such a categorisation.

As to security and intelligence disclosures by persons who are not members of the security services nor so designated, the White Paper says that the prosecution should have to prove either that disclosure was likely to damage the operation of the security or intelligence services—perhaps that is fair enough—or that the information concerned was of a class or description the disclosure of which would be likely to damage the operation of the services. I invite the Minister and his officials to look carefully at all the difficulties that class immunity has caused in the ordinary civil law, in tort actions, in actions under order 53 of the rules of the supreme court for judicial review—the fastest growing area of law in this country. It seems to me that to create a classification of that type is unduly harsh and will breed uncertainty. It is a classification that may well affect the freedom of the media and of authors such as Chapman Pincher and the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) when the plume of his nom is in his hand.

As regards the disclosure of information relating to defence, it seems to me to be remarkably harsh and restrictive that the Government seek virtually to proscribe information that may prejudice dealings between the Government and Governments of another state or an international organisation. For example, if a British Government official came into possession of evidence in relation to the Iran-Contra scandal, surely it would be in the public interest that he should be able to reveal that information to a responsible journalist. That will not be possible if the proposals are enacted.

As for information obtained in confidence—not relating to security or defence matters—from other Governments or from international organisations, the consequences of that classification are quite absurd. It will be an offence if a Government official discloses anything about, for example, negotiations regarding air routes or international air travel insurance obligations, or even about consumer safety and matters such as the labelling of foodstuffs in Europe. Surely the Government cannot really mean to proscribe the revelation of such information. The White Paper appears to suggest that they do.

It is to be yet another absolute offence to disclose information whose disclosure would be likely to be useful in the commission of offences or to terrorists or in helping a prisoner to escape from custody. That would mean, for example, that the disclosure of certain details of a layout of a prison in the context of criticism of the conditions in hat establishment could be included, as those details might be likely to help an astute observer or reader of what is revealed to assist a prisoner to escape from that prison. Surely the Government cannot really be intending to enact legislation which would close down the legitimate comments of the press on such issues? The provision is absurdly wide. I give the Minister credit, and say no more than that the Government have simply not thought about such issues in the drafting of the White Paper. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills when he refers to the fearsome nature of the proposals relating to the interception of cummunications. They mean that, although the Government chose not to prosecute Cathy Massiter, because they were rightly afraid of the reaction of the jury, she would now be prosecuted by the Government because she was committing an absolute offence. In the case, of an absolute offence, the judge might well be in a position actually to direct the jury to convict. There is an important difference between section 2, which did not enable the judge to direct the jury to convict in the Ponting case, and the proposals in the White Paper which, in my view, would enable the judge to direct and order the jury to convict. That would apply to someone such as Cathy Massiter.

That brings me directly to the public interest or iniquity defence. We have heard a most extraordinary new constitutional doctrine this morning which can be summarised in six words, "A perverse jury is your safeguard." The Government say, "We will not introduce an iniquity or public interest defence because we think it is inappropriate. We think that there is no need for it because of the liberalism of this White Paper", but, at the same time, the Home Secretary says, "We are leaving it to juries to decide." This contradiction is extraordinary.

Let us think for a moment of what happened in the Ponting case. The trial judge gave his directions on the law to the jury. He did not accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) that there was a public interest defence. His directions to the jury were unequivocal. He told it that, in law, Mr. Ponting did not have a defence, but he was not able to go so far as to direct the jury to convict. The jury went out. It considered the judge's directions and what Mr. Ponting had done and said, "Not guilty." It said, "Not guilty" on one ground alone. It believed that it would be a monstrous injustice against the public interest to find Mr. Ponting guilty.

Such matters are to be left in the hands of juries, boasts the Home Secretary, but what will happen now? The judge may well have the power to direct the jury to convict, so it may not even retire to its room. It may sit in the court —I have seen juries directed to convict in much more trivial cases—and the court clerk will stand up and say, "Mr. foreman, on the direction of my Lord, do you find the defendent guilty?" On that occasion, the jury will have to show a new moral robustness and say, "No, we ignore the direction of the judge and we do not convict." What will happen then?

As a matter of jurisprudence and history, the jury's verdict is not binding. It is always accepted as binding, but, as a matter of strict law, it is a recommendation. Under the Government's proposals, what will happen? Will they expect the judge to say, "Thank you very much, members of the jury. I do not accept your verdict. This defendant is found guilty because that is the law." We are entering a new area where the Government are making themselves a hostage of the most extraordinary kind to a fortune upon which no citizen in a free and democratic society should have to rely—the fortune of having a robust and perverse jury.

There will always be a public interest defence, whether the Government like it or not, because the citizens of this country, even if they are vetted jurors, as in the Ponting case, will ensure that there is a public interest defence. It is absurd, stupid, unrealistic and self-demeaning of any Government of the United Kingdom not to recognise in legislation that that is so.

11.57 am

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) who is always robust in his contributions to these debates. I wish to take up the central theme of his speech and of the speech of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot)—the question of accountability.

The right hon. Gentleman said that Parliament must have influence in these matters. He is absolutely right. The question is how that influence may be attained. I am firmly of the opinion that that accountability arises, as it has always done in this Chamber, through the ministerial accountability of the Minister of the Crown to this Chamber and the duty to answer the questions that are put to him or her by the House. That is the accountability in which this country and this Parliament have traditionally believed. Whatever the interesting merits of the United States, or any other Western liberal democracy, the machinery of government in the United States is very different from that in the United Kingdom and the firmness of the accountability to this Chamber is the most desirable route.

Mr. Dykes rose——

Mr. Richard Shepherd rose——

Mr. Wheeler: Perhaps my hon. Friends will allow me to develop my theme a little further.

In the accountability argument, reference has been made to the possible involvement of a Select Committee of this House or to some special Select Committee procedure which could intervene between the role of the Minister and that of this House. I disagree with that and say so with the authority of having been the Chairman—indeed, I still am —of a Select Committee. I do not believe that the Select Committee procedure is the correct or proper vehicle for dealing with such matters. Accessibility to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who has a particular responsibility in these matters, which is open to every right hon. and hon. Member, is the preferred route of accountability to that of the imprecise route of a Select Committee seeking to call evidence and examine issues of great complexity which go beyond the responsibility or role of a Select Committee.

Mr. Dykes: How can my hon. Friend refer to the absolute high quality of accountability which reassures all hon. Members, when on 11 July an hon. Member asked an innocent and innocuous question of the Home Secretary,

"whether he will issue a directive to the director general of MI6 setting out the parameters of lawful activity, along the lines of the Maxwell Fyfe directive of 24 September 1952, and if he will make a statement."

I would have thought that that was an innocent and innocuous question, but the standard answer came out:

"It has been the long-established practice of this and previous Governments not to comment on such matters." —[Official Report, 11 July 1988; Vol. 137, c. 74.]

Is that really the accountability that we are asking for in this tercentenary year of 1988?

Mr. Wheeler: My hon. Friend knows perfectly well that that is not what I meant, nor is it what I said. I said that the form of accountability is through the Minister of the Crown to the Floor of the House. At the risk of taking more time than I should, I repeat that other methods are open to right hon. and hon. Members in the pursuance of their parliamentary duties. There is no finer or better method than that which this House has practised now for many centuries than the method of talking to the Minister who is responsible for those services and their day-to-day activities. We all know that that method is open to all of us. It is a most acceptable form of accountability and a most desirable way of dealing with these issues.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose——

Mr. Wheeler: If the hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me, I must press on. Time is pressing and other hon. Members wish to speak and I wish to go on to other aspects of the White Paper.

There is no doubt that the 77-year-old section 2 of the Official Secrets Act has now outlived its time. It is right that the House should have the opportunity to replace it and generally to reform the law relating to official secrets. Had the former Labour Government introduced their proposals in 1978 and had those proposals become law, it is likely that today we would have been saying that the enactments of 1978 had proved totally unacceptable and that we want to repeal those measures. There is no doubt that we have advanced considerably since 1978. I daresay that we have advanced still further than the proposals of 1979 when this Government first began to tackle the nettle of how to reform the Official Secrets Act.

Without any hesitation, I can say that I believe that my right hon. Friend and the Government have produced a most acceptable set of proposals. Indeed, the fact that some of my hon. Friends are critical of them for being too liberal is perhaps an indication of how sucessful my right hon. Friend has been. Even those outside this place, in the media industry, who have the greatest financial and vested interest in seeking these matters viewed somewhat differently, have given the White Paper a generous and positive reception, while reserving some elements of criticism, which I may touch on in a moment. It is right to sweep away the measure that we are discussing. Instead, we want to introduce a tough but tightly defined law and it is that concept of definition that we should seek to achieve.

The White Paper proposals will cover six areas of information which it is in all our interests as a country to keep secret. As we know, those areas include defence, security and intelligence, diplomacy and information given in confidence by other Governments, official information helpful to criminals and the interception of telecommunications. All those areas of information will get legal protection. The White Paper will define those categories as strictly and accurately as possible.

With regard to the disclosures of information given in confidence to the United Kingdom by foreign Governments, I recognise the strength of the case put by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). That very issue goes to the heart of our relationships as a country with other countries, and especially with our allies. It is a difficult concept to get right. I advise my hon. Friend the Minister of State that, as we continue to contemplate the White Paper and prepare the Bill, which I hope will be introduced in the next Session, we should see whether it is possible to define the nature of that relationship a bit further. I suspect that we could do so without in any way damaging the importance of the relationship with our allies and other countries. If we could do so, we would in large measure reach an agreement across the House on a matter which is of great importance to the House.

When a case comes to court, the prosecution will inevitably have to prove to the jury not just that information in one of the special categories has been disclosed, but that that disclosure is actually damaging our national interests. It is important to prove that before a jury. It will be for the courts to decide whether the damage test has been met, not for a Minister. We have dropped the idea which was advocated in previous proposals that a certificate signed by a Minister, thus acting as judge, should be enough to prove that damage has been caused.

The special duty of lifelong confidentiality will continue to apply to members of the security services. People who join those services do so voluntarily. They do not have to seek employment within them. Even those rare and special members of the Civil Service, such as my right hon. Friend's principal private secretary who, by the very nature of the special duties that he has to perform with my right hon. Friend becomes privy to the work of the security and intelligence services, could, if he so wished, say to the establishments division of his Department prior to the appointment, "I would rather not take that office because of the binding obligation which will thus devolve upon me." There is a clear and positive statement of obligation. It is absolutely right that people who volunteer to serve the British Crown, the British state and the British people in those services should understand from the outset precisely what those obligations are. What could be clearer or better than that? I am sure that it makes sense.

It is as well to pay some sort of tribute to the work of those services. We have been debating the content of the White Paper, but we should remember that the work done by the people in those services is of exceptional value and that the very nature of it precludes it from being proclaimed from the front pages of the newspapers or on television programmes. Those services help and protect us daily from terrorism and foreign espionage.

Mr. Allason: Is it not extraordinary that we are unique in the world in that nothing may be written about security and intelligence yet last week Comte Alexandre de Marenches, who ran the French intelligence service for 11 years, published a book, and two CIA chiefs stationed in London have published books? There is a perfectly respectable mechanism in most other countries which allows such books to be written. Is my hon. Friend really saying that it is absolutely forbidden for everyone in this country to write about the security services and intelligence?

Mr. Wheeler: As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already said, the publishers of memoirs or an academic in one of our universities who wants to write a book about the history of a recent international or military event may have access to material through a procedure which is well understood by my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) and by hon. Members on both sides of the House. That procedure remains in place.

I want to comment briefly on the public interest defence, which has been discussed today. I do not believe that we should try to include the public interest defence in this legislation. That would create confusion rather than certainty in the law. The criminal law defines an offence in terms of an individual's actions, not his motives, for carrying them out. The latter may be taken into account by the judge in his summing up or when passing sentence and that may well affect the decision of the jury, but it should not be included in the law.

I have already dealt with special duties on the part of those who serve in the security and intelligence services. With regard to prior publication and the position of newspapers and the media industry, as I understand the White Paper, no one can be convicted of revealing information relating to security intelligence, defence or international relations unless the prosecution can prove that disclosure was likely to cause a specified harm to the public interest and that he or she who proclaimed it knew that. Nor can someone be convicted for disclosing information useful to criminals unless the prosecution could show that the information was still likely to be useful despite its prior publication. The defence of prior publication is therefore subsumed within the test of harm.

I also commend my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on having the courage in the White Paper to drop the offence of receiving unauthorised information that is contained in the Official Secrets Act 1911. That point alone is a sign of the liberalisation of the proposal and is why the package as a whole, perhaps with that one area to deal with international affairs upon which I have but briefly touched, deserves the support of the House when a Bill is presented perhaps in the next Session of Parliament.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The debate has been valuable. The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) referred to prior publication. I do not think that the paragraph in the White Paper about that is good enough. It states that the present position would not have existed in the Government's Freedom of Information Bill in 1979. There is no time to develop that argument. I raise the matter simply because I believe that the House needs more time to discuss this White Paper. Of course, Friday is a business day and we all know that hon. Members have engagements on Fridays. I have to attend a public meeting with my constituents on the Housing Bill later this afternoon.

However, so many of the points that I have heard today from the hon. Members for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), and for Westminster, North, and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) need to be taken further if the Minister and the Government, when they produce legislation, want to get it right. Otherwise, they will not get it right.

I believe that the hon. Member for Westminster, North said that if a Labour Government had legislated, there would be complaints now. I am sure that he is right. The White Paper for which I was responsible does not meet all the points about which I am concerned now. To some degree that is inevitable. We should at least have a good shot at it this time and not leave all the bits hanging around in future. We should let more of our colleagues participate.

With regard to parliamentary accountability the time has come to have some way in which the Maxwell Fyfe rules—which are now well out of date—can be assessed. Are those rules, or something like them, the basis on which our security services work now? If there is anything in half the allegations that we hear, that cannot be true. I do not know whether those allegations are right. I have my opinions about Mr. Wright. I have no time for him; a great deal of what he has written is infamy and it was wrong that it should have been published. In that I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). However, parts of what Mr. Wright revealed should have been published.

However, parliamentary accountability on the way in which the security services work is important. The time has come to consider the legalisation of the security services. They have no legal basis. In other countries, the services have such a basis, which I had not realised. That should be considered.

The role of the Attorney-General, and the public interest, should also be considered. There are proposals to cover that in the new legislation. As I understand it, the Attorney-General must decide on prosecution and whether that is in the public interest. There have been excellent Attorneys-General in all Governments over the years. However, the security side of things is not their strength. There is a tendency to believe too easily that it is in the public interest to do something or other.

We need more time to consider these matters. Unlike the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, I am glad that we have not got a freedom of information Bill. Such a Bill would be far too long. We must make clear what will be prosecutable under the criminal law. Once that is clear, freedom of information will fall into place. To break the Official Secrets Act 1911 for a moment, I must state that I had a slight problem when in government. It is quite simple. We might have produced a Bill that was a hundred miles long, and it was not easy to operate with a minority of three, on the Franks committee. It is very important to clarify issues under the Official Secrets Act 1911, and it would help the new procedures.

Mr. Dykes: The right hon. Gentleman asked for clarification about what is prosecutable. Does he not agree that that should be supplemented by the vital urgency of increased accountability by this place? That might lead him to agree that that means putting the specific contents of the Maxwell Fyfe directive into the new Bill as the parameter for the security services, coupled with the creation of a Select Committee consisting of Privy councillors on the supervision of the security services.

Mr. Rees: I am not sure about the Maxwell Fyfe rules. They do not stand up 30 years on. Something beyond them is necessary. We must discuss what a Select Committee would do and the nature of its report.

I was a member of the Franks committee. It produced a good report largely because of the experience and background of Lord Franks. That does not mean that everything that it said was right. I made changes in a White Paper in 1978 and this Government have made others. There is nothing wrong with the principle of change.

I had doubts about ministerial certificates. After I had held high office, I was absolutely sure that I had doubts about the accuracy and classification of a document. On the Franks committee, we questioned civil servants about the basis of the classification of documents and we were not much the wiser at the end of the day. The White Paper states:

"Classification is still necessary for administrative purposes but is not relevant to any prosecutions."

I doubt that.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): My experience in the Civil Service clearly showed me that classification is a function of the length of time since the last time that classifications were reviewed. What happens is that a civil servant thinking that there might be the slightest embarrassment as a result of marking a document "Confidential" will mark it "Highly confidential", and so on. Classification must be reviewed every two years; otherwise, everything is marked "Secret".

Mr. Rees: That is an interesting point, and it leads me to my next remark. If there were to be a jury trial, any perceptive lawyer would raise during the course of the proceedings the documents' classification. Time is of the greatest importance. I have some classified documents of no great importance, although I suppose they break some rule or another. After the lapse of all this time, they are not worth a light to anybody, but they were classified at the time. Anyway, I leave it alone—they are not frightfully important.

Mr. John Patten: Perhaps we ought to see them.

Mr. Rees: I shall show them to the hon. Gentleman, if only to convince him that his comments about classification are incorrect. My documents would be proof of that. The same applies to some of the documents about individuals that the security services have, concerning things that those individuals allegedly did 20 or 30 years ago, which places a question mark over them for the rest of their lives. If there is a case for reclassifying documents, there is a case for going through some of those lists and records of what somebody might have said in 1938.

Mr. Patten: From his reading of the White Paper, does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that the concept of classification plays no part in my right hon. Friend's proposals?

Mr. Rees: I did not say that. I said that I bet that any good lawyer would bring the question of the documents' classification into a trial, and for good reason. Mine was a sideways view, that in any event classification needs to be reviewed because it colours the situation in terms of the groups that the Home Secretary has dreamt up, which may have a lifelong application. If documents are to be classified "UK eyes only", and so on, that will colour the grouping in which they are placed. It is important to get the classification right.

The basis of my support for change is to be found in volume 1, section 119, of the Franks report, which stated:

"We believe that most of those who have given evidence to us, and most reasonable people, would accept as a proper basis for the employment of criminal sanctions the unauthorised disclosure of official information which would be likely to cause serious injury to the security of the nation or the safety of the people."

that was the basis of the Franks report. Nobody—and I am not suggesting that the Government have done aught else—can call in aid the Franks report without having that at the top of the page—

"serious injury to the security of the nation or the safety of the people."

The report goes on:

"If criminal sanctions are justified at all, they are justified for this purpose. If they are to be reserved for what is most important, they should not go any wider. We are therefore adopting this as our touchstone."

We were not interested in anything that caused some injury but only that which was likely to cause "serious injury."

As to authorisation, I hope the Home Secretary will study chapter 2 of the Franks report. It was a very curious time of questioning when we dealt, for example, with self-authorisation by civil servants, which is to continue. Because it was not clear what self-authorisation meant, it was clear to the Franks committee that there was a great deal of power in the hands of senior civil servants as to what they might say.

The question of self-authorisation by politicians must be taken into account in any legislation. Most of the Prime Ministers of the past 30 years have authorised themselves, in writing books, to reveal matters which, if they were revealed by the group of people with whom the White Paper deals, could subject them to criminal proceedings under the new Act. Are Ministers included in that grouping or are they outside it? Will they have to sign a document when they become a Cabinet Minister as opposed to being a junior Minister? Will there be a difference between the two? The doctrine of self-authorisation is not clearly described in the White Paper.

I wanted the heading of authorisation to lead me to another point, and if I make it in a blunt way, it is to save time. No Official Secrets Act will stop me from pursuing the matter of dirty tricks by the secret services against Governments of any persuasion. It cannot be in the public interest, and cannot come under any classification, that one should not talk about such matters. That cannot be a secret that must be protected.

I have brought along one of the documents that I have collected, which is all about Ireland, and at the bottom of which appears my name and "Stan Orme" and "David Owen"—a trio of likely lads to have written such a document. It was put out by people working in the Government service, in league to some degree—not just in Ireland but over here. Here is the document, and hon. Members may by all means take a look at it.

Mr. McWilliam rose——

Mr. Rees: I would rather hang on to it for a moment.

[Mr. Rees]

The content of that document, with which my name and "David Owen" are associated, is absolute rubbish. That was done to denigrate members of Her Majesty's Opposition. I have more. The stuff must have been written by people with an honours CSE in politics. It is elemental rubbish, but somebody put it out to denigrate politicians. It was part of the dirty tricks set-up. I have two or three such documents. I have said that I think I know where they emanated from. What will be the situation under the new legislation? If I were to pursue that matter and try to get to the bottom of it, would I be breaking the law? I hope not, because it is not in the public interest to keep quiet about that sort of rubbish.

I may tell the House, in terms of one's own patriotism, that my father died a member of the Labour party as a result of the first world war. He would have been regarded as some kind of radical. I do not know that he read The Guardian, but he read things that, in the eyes of some people, were even worse. Yet such rubbish is written about us. I want to be absolutely sure that the new law will not prevent one from pursuing such matters.

Mr. John Patten: The piece of paper that the right hon. Gentleman has been waving around so teasingly, but has not yet given to his hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) or to me, does not on the face of it purport to be official information; it is information that has been circulated by someone who the right hon. Gentleman suspects may have been some kind of forger.

Mr. Rees: No. It is rubbish, but it is not a forgery. It was written and put out by people in the Government service, and it is a serious allegation.

On Saturday night I went on a programme—I did not know when I went that it would go on for half the night, but that is another matter—in which a man told us that he was a private investigator employed by MI5. I have obtained the film from the Library, and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has seen it. What the man said was incredible. He alleged that people in the security services were no longer concerned—as they should be—with spying and terrorism, but were concerned with people who were protesting about the building of atomic power stations.

Would that man, who assured me—I shall pursue the matter—that he was employed by the security services, be breaking the new laws by revealing such information publicly?

Mr. Dykes: Presumably he would have to give it to a parliamentarian, who could read the entire document in the House. It would then be covered by parliamentary privilege—which shows again how nonsensical the position would be.

Mr. Rees: I think that I have raised a good point. It is for the Government to answer. As the man was not a full-time employee, has he the right to go to the staff counsellor? He was paid on a contract basis; he has now been paid off with money in a brown envelope. It had to be money in a brown envelope, did it not?

I hope that we shall have time to discuss the major issues, such as accountability, that have been mentioned today. We need an Official Secrets Act to protect the nation's secrets, but we do not need to protect the secrecy of the Government. We need to replace section 2 on the basis of the principle laid down in the Franks report.

Unless they are careful, the Government will make the mistake that I suspect we were making in government. There needs to be much wider discussion than a White Paper, a Bill and discussions in Cabinet Sub-Committees. I do not believe that the White Paper in its present form will be the end of the story, and I hope that the Government will think again about a number of fundamental issues.

The principle is absolutely right. Far fewer criminal charges will arise than in the existing circumstances, but that of itself is not enough. I want to see the Franks principle in legislation. Serious injury to the nation is all that matters, and if what is revealed leads to a Government being uncomfortable, so be it. Half a dozen points in the White Paper need to be rethought, and I hope that the House can play a part in that.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): I wholeheartedly agree with the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) that the White Paper should not be the end of the story, and that we should try to get closer to the Franks principle than at least some parts of the White Paper.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary struck a somewhat grandiose note in his opening speech when he described his White Paper as having the effect of an earthquake in Whitehall. The phrase reminded me of the award-winning entry for the world's dullest journalistic headline, "Small earthquake in Chile: not many dead". I think that this is a case of "Small earthquake in Whitehall: not many secrets liberalised".

I say that because many of the liberalisation proposals do no more than cut away the dead wood of catch-all secrets legislation in Government Departments whose secrets presented no threat to security in any event. Although we welcome the degree of liberalisation that has come about—for I do not wish to sound too churlish—it is very much an instance of mandarins yielding to the inevitable after some 20 years of pressures, proposals and counter-proposals.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary no doubt has had a difficult job in corralling all the permanent secretaries and persuading them that they must give up the handcuffs of the criminal law placed on their Departments' areas of so-called secrecy. I give him two cheers for doing a competent job, but at least three should be directed to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), whose pioneering Private Member's Bill made it all possible.

That small earthquake in Whitehall is unsatisfactory. It has left at least two major citadels of unnecessary secrecy not merely standing but strengthened in a completely unacceptable way. The first of these citadels relates to paragraph 51 of the White Paper. It has already been savagely criticised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills and others.

The paragraph proposes an absolute criminal offence for disclosures relating to information obtained in confidence from other Governments or international organisations. I go further in my criticism than anybody else has yet gone and say that this paragraph of the White Paper is plain daft. Paragraph 51 could have been drawn up only by some old-fashioned, myopic, Carlton-Browne of the Foreign Office-type character who has spent so much of his life overseas that he seriously believes that foreigners' confidences need a higher degree of protection by our criminal law than Britain's own Budget secrets.

That element of Foreign Office farce has been heightened by the risible reply given to the parliamentary question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills. He asked for a list of the international organisations covered by paragraph 51 that creates all these new criminal offences, and he received the amazing answer on 12 July that it was not practicable to provide such a list. The answer did not go on to say whether it was not practicable because the list was too long, or too secret, or too ridiculous. Probably it was all three. It will not do. I urge the Government to drop this paragraph from the White Paper.

To be personal for a moment, if paragraph 51 were to become law it would represent the ultimate futility and failure of nearly 20 years of campaigning for section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 to be reformed. The House may remember that when I was a young journalist I spent six weeks in the dock at the Old Bailey alongside the editor of the Sunday Telegraph. Our case had nothing to do with national security. It was about information that had been given in confidence to one of our diplomats by members of the then Nigerian military junta, although the most sensitive part of the information given in confidence related to the Nigerian army's inability to shoot straight or to fight battles after 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

According to paragraph 51 as it stands, the editor of the Sunday Telegraph and I would have committed an absolute criminal offence against which there would have been no defence, and we would still be languishing in Wormwood Scrubs. As I have criticised my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary so much, there may be moments when he thinks that that might not have been such a bad idea. In all seriousness, however, I hope that this paragraph will be thrown out of the window.

I am also worried about paragraphs 38 to 44 of the White Paper that deal with security and intelligence matters. Like all sensible people, I accept that there are some security and intelligence secrets, such as anti-terrorist operations, that must rightly be stringently protected by these legislative proposals and by section 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911—a tough provision that is to be left completely intact by the new legislation. Certain paragraphs in the White Paper are completely over the top, and I think that I know the reason why.

This is the first ever Government White Paper that might be said to be haunted. The ghost of Peter Wright stalks through several of its pages and paragraphs. It has evidently frightened its authors into a veritable seizure of over-reaction and excessive authoritarianism. Whatever view one might take of the "Spycatcher" saga, we must remember that Parliament passes laws not just to crack hard cases or to take revenge for past events but to be fair to future generations and to the overwhelming majority of loyal and responsible security service employees. Like any other citizens, those who work in the secret world are entitled to some civil rights. Parliament cannot pass a law that effectively suspends Magna Carta for a certain category of Crown servants, just because Peter Wright once caused some embarrassment to Whitehall and Government Ministers.

Let me give some specific examples of how the proposals in paragraphs 38 to 44 of the White Paper make it an absolute offence for Government security officers, past or present, ever to say anything about their work. Let us consider, for example, the position of a current security service employee who is dissatisfied with an administrative ruling that affects his conditions of service, such as his pension, or an allegation of racial discrimination. Having gone through all the approved channels, including the staff counsellor, an employee may still feel that he has been treated unjustly and wants to see his Member of Parliament.

The right of access to a Member of Parliament is important for any citizen, but it is exceptionally important for people such as those who are employed in the security services, who are prohibited from joining a trade union. Under the White Paper, it is a criminal offence for a security service employee to go to his constituency Member of Parliament, because, when discussing his grievance, the officer will have to disclose to some limited information about his security service employment. I argue that the doctrine of absolute confidentiality for life —a new-fangled invention by the Government—does not extinguish all civil rights such as the right to access to parliamentary representatives.

We should reflect for a moment on the extraordinary brouhaha created by the Government about the BBC's series "My Country, Right or Wrong". It is a very good example of how the White Paper would work in practice, although the legal sanctions would be criminal and not civil. The House will recall that the BBC invited several former members of the security services, such as Lord Dacre and Mr. John Day, to contribute to its series of programmes, which they did. They recorded a number of comments, which were so anodyne as to be bordering on the tedious, as it turned out, on matters such as parliamentary accountability, management and how the service works with Ministers.

The Attorney-General took the view, which is repeated in the White Paper, that those contributions, irrespective of their content, were a breach of the life-long obligation of absolute confidentiality and had to be hit with the law. It was a very odd view, bearing in mind the fact that the Director-General of MI5 had known all about his former employees' contributions and had sent round an internal circular to his officers saying that they had nothing to fear from the programmes. The Attorney-General evidently took a different view. He hurled writs and injunctions at the BBC more in the manner of an exuberant wedding guest throwing confetti than a Law Officer of the Crown. When the confetti settled, not a comma was changed in the programmes. Every legal action was withdrawn. Not one word was struck out, and all three programmes went out intact.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): The hon. Gentleman is too kind about "My Country, Right or Wrong". He will recall that the Government first tried to insist on seeing transcripts of the programmes before they were broadcast and that only when the BBC properly stood its ground did the Government do the proper thing and go to the courts.

Mr. Aitken: That is a perfectly fair and valid point. Why should responsible former security service personnel have to face criminal prosecution and certain conviction for talking about non-operational, non-secret aspects of their service on a topic which is already a matter of public debate? Retired military officers are able to do that all the time, often it might be said, to the benefit of the subject under discussion.

Why does Britain need to create a stockaded, barricaded leper colony of Crown servants, who have such different rules of secrecy on them that they are silenced from all communications in a far stricter way than are their equivalents in West Germany, France, Israel, Canada, the United States, Australia and all other democracies?

I fear that the combination of moral indignation and legal incompetence in the Peter Wright saga has given birth to an almost totalitarian set of proposals for this narrow group of Crown servants. Some rethinking is needed. It is no use saying that the machinery exists for security service officers to have their memoirs vetted. Peter Wright tried to get his memoirs vetted so that a deal could be struck but the Treasury solicitor refused any such deal. Mr. Anthony Cavendish sent in his memoirs and was told that five chapters had to come out. That is not reasonable machinery for dealing with memoirs or reminiscences.

We should consider what happens in other countries. The former director-general of the Australian secret service has just published his memoirs, the book having been vetted perfectly responsibly. Sir Percy Sillitoe and Sir William Stephenson produced memoirs. Ministers do it all the time in their privileged capacity. I urge the Home Secretary to insert into a Bill some proper machinery for authorising memoirs and responsible communication on radio or in discussion. The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) is chairman of a Committee and invited a security services official to talk to the Committee. That had to be cancelled because it was suddenly realised that the absolute doctrine of confidentiality might apply. Therefore, there is a lot of rethinking to be done on that section.

Finally, on the subject of defences, I wish to record my dismay that that is no prior publication defence, no iniquity defence and that the interests of state defence has been removed. Those matters have been covered by other speeches so as time is short I simply place on record that, above all, the section 2(1)(a) defence should be reinserted. We shall return to those matters in Committee—incidentally, I sincerely hope that it will be a Committee of the whole House.

We must remember that we are legislating for succeeding generations. The little local difficulties of Peter Wright are small beer when compared with the need to draw for the future the boundaries between the individual's right to speak and the Government's right to keep secrets. That boundary needs to be drawn in a better and less authoritarian place than the one where the White Paper draws it.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): First, I declare an interest as a sponsored member of the National Communications Union, which represents some 200,000 trade unionists in British Telecom and the Post Office, many of whom, past and present, will be badly affected by the Home Secretary's proposals.

Last night, when I was looking at my notes for this debate, it occurred to me, suddenly and shockingly, that it is some 31 years since I signed a document which reminded me that I was subject to all provisions of the Official Secrets Act. Some five years ago I signed another document that said that I was still subject to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act. On the advice of the then Clerk of the House, I endorsed the document subject to my privileges as a Member of Parliament and signed it. No one said anything to me about it, therefore I am probably entitled to tell the House about it.

In all the time that I have been involved in trying to deal sensibly with the interception of communications and other aspects of the Official Secrets Act, I have determinedly not broken the law save in one respect. I have always accepted prior publication. If something was common knowledge in the public domain and was in circulation, I could see no reason why I should not refer to it in the same way as any other hon. Member if it assisted in our debates.

Perhaps it will assist the House if I put on record my union's general view on the reform of the Official Secrets Act. We accept that certain categories of information in the Post Office and British Telecom ought to be protected by criminal sanctions but that those categories should be as few as possible, compatible with the interests of the security of the nation and individual privacy. We support the Government's broad approach of replacing the catch-all section 2 of the 1911 Act by more specific sanctions. We believe that criminal sanctions should apply only to security and intelligence information if its disclosure would cause serious injury to the interests of the nation. We believe that classification should be determined by the courts, or at least by an independent committee, and that there should be a statutory right of access to official information in all Government Departments on the lines of the American Freedom of Information Act.

Therefore, the Government should not proceed with legislation on the reform of the Official Secrets Act at least until the proposed study of overseas experience of open government has been completed, published and evaluated by the House.

That demonstrates to the House that we take these matters seriously, we do not take lightly our responsibilities, and that we always try to be as sensitive and sensible as possible when dealing with these matters.

I shall now return to the White Paper that exists rather than the one that we should like to see. Ours would be rather more on the lines of the one published by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) who is entitled to be disappointed with what is before the House. Paragraph 53 on interception is gibberish. The Minister should not rely on the Interception of Communications Act 1985 because that introduced an even more oppressive regime than that which existed when it was not clear whether intercepting communications was legal. The paragraph says:

"no information obtained by means of interception can be disclosed without assisting terrorism or crime, damaging national security or seriously breaching the privacy of private citizens."

That is clearly nonsense. What about the many private citizens whose telephones and mail are intercepted and who are entirely innocent? Their privacy has been seriously breached by the state and they have no effective safeguards. There is no point in the Minister diving for the 1985 Act. I know that it contains safeguards but they are not good enough.

It is pointless for a citizen to say, "I think that my telephone is being illegally tapped." By the time anybody comes to investigate it, the illegal tap will have been lifted and the people who investigate are qualified only to look at the paperwork. They are not qualified to go into the telephone exchange to look at the main frame to determine whether the line contains a connection additional to those that should be there. They have no expertise in doing that and could not do it. In such a case, surely the least to which a citizen should be entitled is the sight of what had been obtained from his telephone line or from his post, and he should also have sight of that information being destroyed. Hon. Members should remember that I am talking about an innocent British citizen, guilty of no crime whatever because the legal intercept has failed to turn one up.

The Minister cannot tell the House that there is not continued abuse by the security services and the police of their powers to intercept, because that abuse continues. There are no fewer intercepts than there were before and a high proportion were not properly authorised. The Minister would not know that. I have discussed the matter with previous Home Secretaries.

Mr. Allason: The hon. Gentleman is making an extraordinary allegation. Is he seriously saying that many illegal intercepts have been conducted by the police and the security services? Has he made that same allegation to the judge who, under the 1985 Act, is responsible for supervision? I presume that the hon. Gentleman has done that.

Mr. McWilliam: Over the years the allegation has been made repeatedly by me and by other hon. Members. It has been made specifically to the bodies responsible and information has been supplied to them, but no effective action has been taken because it is quite convenient to leave the situation as it exists.

Mr. Dykes: Is the hon. Gentleman anxious about the telephone of any hon. Member being tapped either at home or in the office?

Mr. McWilliam: No, I am not. If the hon. Gentleman casts his memory back to 1964 he will recollect that the then Prime Minister, now Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, said that when he assumed office he discovered that intercepts of mail and communications had been in existence for Members of Parliament and that he had had the practice stopped. In response to questions the Prime Minister has repeatedly told the House that that practice no longer continues. I have no proof that since 1964 any hon. Member has been or is being intercepted. That is not to say that it cannot happen because of another matter that I am about to deal with, but it would be accidental rather than deliberate.

I shall now deal with international relations. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills wondered what kind of organisation would be caused problems. A problem occurred five or six years ago when it transpired in evidence before the American congressional armed forces committee that the supreme allied commander in Europe had applied for an upgrade in nuclear shells with screw-on adaptors that would convert them to neutron weapons —there had been discussion about that in NATO—and that that highly confidential, highly classified information had appeared in American papers. We will not be able to discuss that. Paragraph 50 of the White Paper says

"or to endanger the safety of a British citizen."

Were an update to take place, it would endanger the lives of members of the British Army of the Rhine because the only way in which artillery can be used is close up.

I am deeply disappointed with the White Paper. The opportunity to do something constructive has been lost. Many hon. Members had high hopes for the Protection of Official Information Bill. I am not sure how members of my trade union will be affected by the proposed reform. Are those employed by the Post Office covered because they are still public servants but those employed by British Telecom covered differently because they are not, or will an additional section be passed that will again whip us all in? I very much suspect that one will be, but I look forward to finding out.

I draw hon. Members' attention to paragraph 17, which deals with ministerial certificates. It contains a sentence —if I take it out of context, hon. Members will understand —that underlines the Government's thinking behind the White Paper. It says:

"But no other body or individual shares the Minister's responsibility for safeguarding the interest of the nation".

I remind the Minister that a countryman of mine called Charlie Stuart once thought that and lost his head because of it. We also had the deposition of James II and the glorious revolution. The House is not always so supine as to accept ministerial diktat over the rights of individual citizens, and I am afraid that those rights are not being extended by the White Paper.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): In his concluding remarks, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said that he saw the White Paper as a "significant step towards reform." Section 2 has stood for a long time and, as it has been through a bruising history of disagreement, there is a tendency to regard this reform as the only chance to effect the legislation for many years ahead. My hope and expectation is that when this legislation is passed—I have no doubt that it will be amended—it will create, as experience of it grows, a platform from which we can advance further.

The White Paper explicitly has a limited objective—to make it simpler to enforce section 2 and make it narrow in scope. Perhaps it goes nearer than the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook. (Mr. Hattersley) thinks to his aim of positive, tight and effective control. It is not a freedom of information proposal.

I share the schizophrenia of the public—and, I suspect of hon. Members—about the secret services. Part of me recoils from the spectacle of society being permeated by large numbers of anonymous, perpetual schoolchildren, fascinated for life by dungeons and dragons games played by real people and increasingly persuaded that everything that happens does so because of a malign, conspiratorial intent.

The idea that my telephone might be tapped without the knowledge and consent of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary or of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that information derived from the tap might be entered into records of whose existence I shall for ever remain ignorant and that it might be seen by people of whom I am ignorant and who will make what use they choose of it, sends a frisson down my spine. I long at such moments for tighter and more open control. That is why we should consider carefully, on another occasion, the suggestions made by many hon. Members and also the suggestion made by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) that we should have much tighter parliamentary control of the security service machine to provide an effective recourse for individuals who may be damaged by improper and oppressive activity by the secret services.

However, when I learn that a 1,700lb bomb has been placed in a shopping centre—timed to go off to create the maximum civilian casualties—and has been reached by brave security men less than five minutes before it was set to explode, I realise how much we owe to the security services. I then recoil from measures that might destroy their effectiveness or diminish their protection against injury from our country's enemies. In that sense I am schizophrenic as, I am sure, are many other hon. Members.

The issues raised go wider than today's debate. I have made clear my support for a degree of parliamentary control over the security services, if only over their budget. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) remarked in an earlier debate on the subject, we do not even have that degree of control.

My right hon. Friend the Home Security has advanced the position considerably and should be congratulated on listening so carefully to what was said when the House debated the Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). I welcome the assertion in the White Paper that Cabinet documents as a class are not to be protected under section 2. Policy-making in this country is too secretive, partly because we have so much legislation in each parliamentary Session that speed rather than thoroughness becomes the touchstone of ministerial effectiveness. I welcome the fact that section 2 will no longer cover the majority of Cabinet papers, although, of course, internal discipline will still afford them some protection.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary explained that he was determined to reduce the material covered by section 2. He will do so against the background of a massive reduction in the number of subjects to whom section 2 applies. In the teeth of vigorous opposition from Labour Members, who are now so keen to denigrate the White Paper, the Government have hugely reduced the size of the public sector and hence the scope of the Official Secrets Act.

I also welcome the change that removes the offence of receiving information, and I welcome enormously the policy of leaving decisions to juries. It is highly probable that that decision will lead to a progressive narrowing of the categories of case brought by Governments, as juries tend, over time, to be more sensible than Governments. That is what Governments mean when they talk about perverse juries. However, it is more appropriate to handle such matters through juries than to leave it to Ministers to decide matters in their own cause.

The campaign for fewer secrets and less protection for certain categories of secret would be greatly enhanced if we had a higher quality of journalism in this country. There are still too many journalists who find it easier to titilate their readership with scabrous details of the family lives of public servants who are sometimes thrust into the limelight unnecessarily than to collect and painstakingly to distil the mass of public informattion that is available.

If journalists were seriously concerned to press to the limit the information that is already available to them, we would be better placed to argue for the next stage of openness. It is because I have no doubt that we need more openness that I welcome what my right hon. Friend and his colleagues have done to open up the sources of information that we have, and the journalists, use so little.

It is essential to have some mechanism to prevent the treacherous, the unbalanced, the disgruntled or the venal from betraying their colleagues and/or the Government. In the time of the former Conservative Government, my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the then Prime Minister, sought the views of editors on what should replace section 2, and the only reply that he received was that section 2 should be wiped out, nothing should be put in its place and everybody should be free to publish everything except information controlled by section 1. That was not acceptable then, and I suspect that it would not be acceptable to any subsequent Prime Minister, and I congratulate my right hon. Friend on advancing the matter since then. Progress will depend on a combination of experience and trust. I am hopeful that experience will show the Government that they can go further towards trusting the people, and I trust my right hon. Friend, who said that these proposals are a "significant step towards reform".

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): I hold a quiet view of my own that far too much of the time of the Chamber in the past three or four years has been spent on official secrecy. The Government, the Opposition and the media have got into a hyperactive state over what is meant by official secrets. We should recognise that, by and large, we are damn lucky that we live in a comparatively open and free country. I wish that the House would spend more time looking at the confidential information about the nation's economy, industry, commerce and business. Grave matters arise in these important sectors, but we do not seem to have got our legislation correct in dealing with those who have done more damage to our economy than ever Peter Wright or any other alleged malefactor has done.

I have spent much of my life in industry or dealing with matters relating to industry. It is sad to think of the vast amount of time that is spent by companies, whether multinational or medium-sized, on protecting their vital interests. It may interest the House to know that for a number of years I have had links with the CIA. I refer, of course, to the Chemical Industries Association. This organisation, which represents virtually every chemical company in the United Kingdom, is disappointed, as I am, that nothing in the White Paper gives any information about the Government's thinking on this important sector.

However, from time to time these companies voluntarily hand over information to the Government, directly or through Government agencies. That information is often requested by the Government. It is often information of an economic or business nature. It might concern sales, production volumes or trade secrets. Many of the trade secrets in the chemical industry concern chemical formulas.

A great deal of the information that companies hand over to the Government or to Government agencies is often not patentable and is given to the Government on a strict commercial confidential basis. The White Paper does not recognise the commercial value of that information if it should fall into the hands of competitors. It does not take a very bright person to realise that most of the industrial nations with embassies in the United Kingdom employ a person who is soley engaged in what we would call industrial espionage. We have seen the damage that has been done by Third-world countries emerging into industrial states and blatently taking away many of our long-established patents and much of our technology.

I am not suggesting that, because information is given to a civil servant on a commercial basis and that civil servant inadvertently discloses some of the information, he should be subjected to criminal sanctions, but, if companies have to proceed through the present civil system, there are often long and difficult legal delays in providing them with adequate compensation if they win their cases.

It is sad to think that, while legislation is pending, the advantages of technology could be frittered away. That means loss of profit for a company and, in the long run, damage to shareholders. More importantly, from my political stance as a trade unionist, it means a loss of job prospects for employees. I hope that the Minister will pursue the issue of commercial confidentiality and the damage that can be done to this country's interests with the same vigour with which he has pursued matters concerning official secrecy, at his next Cabinet meeting or when he and his colleagues consider the preparation of the Queen's Speech, and bring forward appropriate legislation.

I am sure that the Minister will find much more detailed information by contacting the organisations that represent industry, trade and commerce, and I hope that he will recognise the need to strengthen the law regarding the breach of commercial secrets. In the long run, that is more damaging to the nation and to our industrial base. High technology has been developed in some of our companies with national household names, yet the rewards are not being given to the nation and to those who are employed, either directly or indirectly, by those organisations.

I have listened to the debate with great interest. I am surprised that so many hon. Members are so knowledgeable about matters of secrecy. I am pleased that I am ignorant about them. I have never signed the Official Secrets Act and I do not see any need to do so. The House should not get too hetup about the matter. We should direct our attention to matters of real substance, such as the well-being of the industrial base of our nation.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate. I waited for five hours to speak during the debate on the Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) but alas, was not called. I am grateful for the opportunity to bring the House back to the subject of official secrets. The hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) should be reassured because although he may never have signed the Official Secrets Act, he and everybody else in this country is covered by it, whether they like it or not. Signing the document simply means that in the event of being convicted, one would not have the excuse of saying, "I did not really know what I was doing your lordship." The prosecution would say that the gravity of one's offence had been brought to one's attention.

I am also grateful to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary because he has answered a couple of the points that have caused me considerable concern. If I understood him correctly, he seemed to be saying that although there was not a defence of public interest, a defence of prior publication or a defence of iniquity in the White Paper, juries would take such matters into account. Unfortunately, I did not really appreciate my right hon. Friend's attitude of "We know best" and his statement that there is a mechanism whereby people can publish and former members of the security and intelligence services can write and get authority to publish material.

Because so much depends on the three magic words, "disclosure without authority", we should try to look at the mechanism of "authority". I had some first-hand experience of that in the late 1970s. I approached the then secretary of the D notice committee. I said that I had been commissioned to write a history of the security service and that although I had never been employed by the security service, I wanted to be able to ensure that I was not damaging national security and that I should like to be able to submit my manuscript. I was treated with something close to contempt.

In the following year, when I did submit my manuscript, a look of horror came over the secretary's face. At our third meeting he said that he had been instructed to request the deletion of 194 names, plus two chapters relating to the security service's wartime work in Ireland. We negotiated. Some chapters were deleted and a large number of names removed. Nevertheless, the book got through. The system seemed to be working at that stage.

However, by the following year things had gone badly wrong. I telephoned the D notice secretary and said that I had written another book about the security service called "A Matter of Trust", and that I would like to submit it. He said, "Splendid, send it round." I was never able to send it round because within a day and a half of making that telephone call, I received an injunction preventing me from taking any step towards the further publication of my manuscript. It turned out that the D notice secretary was also covered by that injunction. Things do not seem to have changed very much since those days.

It is extraordinary that just a few years later, with the BBC undergoing exactly the same experience, we do not seem to have learnt a great deal.

Mr. Garrett: Who issued the injunction?

Mr. Allason: The injunction was issued by the Attorney-General and the case was dealt with in 1982.

Is the D notice committee really a sensible mechanism for allowing and studying publication? I do not think that it is. The present secretary of the D notice committee is frank about his views. He says that nothing on this subject should ever be written and that, given the opportunity, he would stop all publications of this kind even if they were historical in nature. He is really a glorified photocopier. He receives a manuscript, photocopies it and sends one copy to the relevant department—the security service, the intelligence service or Government communications headquarters, Cheltenham. They then produce comments.

The point is that the department's serving officers look through the manuscripts to decide what should and should not be published or what should be deleted. That is absolutely crazy. For example, I was asked to remove dozens of names from the most recent book that I delivered to the D notice secretary, including names which appear in Kim Philby's book in 1968. In the face of that kind of obstruction, can my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State really claim that the system works well? I do not believe that it does.

Why was my book in 1982 called "A Matter of Trust"? It was so titled because I believed that that was the essence of the relationship between the director-general of the security service and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Even with the Maxwell Fyfe directives, there was no other formal relationship between the two.

A Prime Minister must have confidence in his or her director-general. However, looking back over my experience, what material was deleted from "A Matter of Trust" when it was eventually published? What were the Government so concerned about? The deletions involved examples in which the director-general of the security service had deliberately mislead the Prime Minister of the day. I am not referring to current events or events about which this Government have any reason to be embarrassed. The events date way back to when the director-general of the secretary service deliberately mislead Prime Minister Attlee over whether Klaus Fuchs had already been investigated and whether there had been a recommendation for Fuchs to be subject to an inquiry because of his probable espionage. That was a major mistake. The director-general at the time, Sir Percy Sillitoe, was persuaded, against his better judgment and very reluctantly, to protect his organisation. He was told by three senior members of the security service that if he went to the Prime Minister and told the truth, it would be damaging to the morale of the security service. That happened in 1949, but there have been other cases, including, for example, the Bruno Pontecorvo case and the astonishing Burgess and Maclean White Paper.

I do not want to delve into history. My point is that the Government cannot claim that everything in the garden is rosy. Whatever one's perspective when we look back at these events, the fact is that things have gone very badly wrong. There is no reason to believe that anything has changed.

Very recently the all-party parliamentary war crimes group tried to obtain from the Foreign Office a file which the Foreign Office admits exists on Klaus Barbie. I suggested to the Minister concerned at the Foreign Office that presumably the reluctance to release the file stemmed from the fact that the Foreign Office wanted to ensure that Barbie received a fair trial in France and now that he has been convicted that excuse no longer existed. I was told that because the file, dated 1945-46, contained intelligence information, it might be of use to an enemy and could not be released because there was established precedent. I asked the Minister of State at the time, "Are you aware that the person who was head of the anti-Soviet section within the secret intelligence service in 1945-1946 was Kim Philby, and from whom are we trying to keep that fact secret?" That is the attitude today. More recently, I have tried to obtain access to wartime decrypts of signals that passed between the Japanese naval attaché in Berlin and Tokyo, which are in the Foreign Office's possession, in the Public Record Office. Those same decrypts are available in Tokyo and in the Washington national archives. However, the Foreign Office refuses to allow those files to be available in the Public Record Office and to explain its actions. That is an appalling state of affairs, and it is a direct reflection of Whitehall's attitude to this very sensitive subject.

The Government have not had an easy ride over secrecy. If the House will bear with me, I shall mention a few of the cases we heard about this morning. Some will be familiar to many people and some will not. Since 1979, there has been the Tisdall case; the Ponting case; the Belgrano affair, which was intelligence orientated; the Cathy Massiter case; telephone tapping scandals; the "Spycatcher" fiasco; the BBC programme "My Country, Right or Wrong"; the conviction of Michael Bettaney; the injunction on Anthony Cavendish; the GCHQ union saga; the GCHQ scandal of leakages in Hong Kong; the Zircon satellite affair; the Cyprus signals case; the Rothschild statement; and Geoffrey Prime.

My reason for mentioning them all is to demonstrate that they are not passing issues or banana skins that are special to this Government. They are banana skins that will blight all Governments of all complexions in the future. It is an occupational hazard that there will be leakages of information and security cock-ups, and it is important that we should get these matters right.

I revert to 1979, and to a case that I did not mention but which was probably the most significant—that of Anthony Blunt. It was significant because, as was previously stated, the Prime Minister, to her credit, was very frank about the security service's role and made a candid statement. She was more frank than any previous Prime Minister on the subject. That was in 1979. It is not so much that we should commend her for her frankness, but that we should examine what was the advice of the security service in 1979. I can tell the House what it was.

Sir John Jones, who was then director-general of the security service, said, "You must not expose Sir Anthony Blunt. He must be protected at all costs, because if he is publicly exposed as a spy, we shall all be in trouble. It will mean that we shall never be able to offer credible immunity from prosecution to others of his ilk." The Prime Minister considered that advice, and I imagine that because she is a barrister, she considered also that she might have had to stand by and watch Sir Anthony Blunt perjure himself, as he was going to do by bringing an action for defamation against an author. The Prime Minister decided, rightly in my view, that the security service's advice was wrong and that here was an opportunity for her to be frank. That is exactly what happened.

Alas, circumstances have changed since 1979. How are hon. Members ever to be educated about and to acquaint themselves with the conduct of the security service and related matters unless they are instructed in broad terms, on matters of principle, by people who have experience of them? My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) mentioned the case of John Day, who was injuncted when he wished to discuss not operational details or matters relating to his work in the security service that were definitely secret but broad principles of accountability. That was banned, and would have been banned under the measures proposed in the White Paper it would also have been banned. He might even be serving the first year of a two-year prison sentence by now. Michael McCaul is another former member of the security service, someone with wide experience whom the nation trusted to work in a most sensitive area for more than 30 years. If he cannot be trusted to come to the House and brief Back Benchers on the principles of accountability and the problems of supervision, on whom are we to rely?

According to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), we are supposed to rely on the present system of accountability, which involves the Secretary of State coming to the House and answering questions. That sounds splendid; the trouble is that it does not happen. When my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills asked a relevant question, he was denied the information that he sought because, by convention, the Secretary of State does not answer questions on this sensitive issue. I do not consider that that is accountability.

I am focusing my remarks particularly on the paragraph relating to the duties of confidentiality of members of the security service. It is important to get this right in the legislation, because it will not go away. During the appeal that was heard in the other place, counsel for the plaintiff—the Government—said that he knew of 10 books that were to be written or had already been embarked upon by former members of the security and intelligence services, some of them recently retired. He was classically misinformed. By my reckoning the number is nearer 15 or 16, and I hope that the Government are rather better informed than I am.

Those proposing to write such books include John Day, Nicholas Elliott, Jock Kane—who has been injuncted—Anthony Cavendish—who has been injuncted but has a contract to write a biography of Maurice Oldfield—the Seymours, the late Jack Morton—whose diaries are to be published—Dick White and Desmond Bristow, who is in Madrid and, like Peter Wright, is out of jurisdiction, as the law that we are discussing will not remotely affect people abroad. Fred Winterbottom is embarking on his fourth volume. Leo Marks has already run into some trouble. Anthony Simpkins has been authorised by the Government, but the historical section of the Cabinet Office has got cold feet and the book does not seem likely to be published in the near future. David Smiley has announced his intention of writing a book. George Blake has published one in the Soviet Union, and another is due out shortly. Even Greville Wynne, God bless him, is writing yet another book from Majorca.

It is all very well to say that there is a mechanism for such people to write their memoirs. There is a mechanism, but it has never worked, it is not working now and there is not the slightest chance of its working in the future. There are possibilities of finding one that would work. Could we, for example, use the Security Commission? Somehow I doubt it. It may have lost a bit of credibility following its recent reports, and no one took any notice of its strong recommendation some years ago for the introduction of polygraphs.

One wonders, too, whether people living abroad will have a duty to submit their manuscripts to the authorities in this country. We know of many cases where they have not bothered. We know also that when they have tried —as did Gordon Welchman, who wrote about his wartime experiences at Bletchley park—they have been threatened with prosecution if ever they returned to this country. GCHQ was so vindictive towards that man that he became an American citizen. He was literally hounded to his death by GCHQ in America. That is no exaggeration. His only job was with the Mitre Corporation in the United States. On GCHQ's recommendation his security clearance was withdrawn. Because he could not work and because he tried to fight that ban in America, he eventually succumbed to a coronary. We do not want that to happen again. We must not create a leper colony.

I am all in favour of confidentiality and of secrets being kept, but I believe that these individuals can be trusted to give us the benefit of their experience without jeopardising national security every time they write or say anything on the subject. We heard about what happened in Australia: the director of the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation wrote a book that has been cleared. We heard about the Comte de Marenche in France. There is scarcely a CIA officer in the United States who has not written a book. There are 14,000 volumes on espionage in the CIA library. A considerable number of those volumes were written by members of the CIA who used the publication review board as an effective mechanism for getting clearance and avoiding the problem of jeopardising national security.

I have long advocated not parliamentary control over the supervision of the security service but the introduction of non-executive directors who would have the confidence of the House. They would be inside my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's wall of secrecy. They would be able to supervise and provide a safety valve for members of the Security Service, who would be able to go to the directors and explain in confidence that they believed that there had been some kind of an inequity. Sir Philip Woodfield has been appointed as staff counsellor, not just for the security service but for the Secret Intelligence Service and for GCHQ. Those latter organisations do not really need a staff counsellor, but the security service needs one. He must not, however, be stuck in the Cabinet Office. It would be impossible for him to work efficiently inside the Cabinet Office. Nine buildings in London are used by the security service. Security service officers who are unhappy about their duties have to ring the Cabinet Office to make an appointment to see Sir Philip. That is not the best system. He ought to have an office inside central security service headquarters so that people could slip in to see him and explain their grievances.

I thank my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) for suggesting that we should look again at this matter. The 1911 Act, which was supposed to have been a temporary law, has been with us for 77 years. It was passed by a Liberal Administration. Now is our opportunity to make sure that we get it right for future generations. It is vital that a law that will be on the statute book for many years should be the best that we can devise. I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to look again at the possibility of establishing a mechanism whereby members of the so-called leper colony will have an opportunity to publish.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The winding-up speeches are expected to begin at about 2 pm. Three hon. Members still wish to speak. I hope that they will divide the time between them.

1.39 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason). Before he came to the House, I thought that he was so well informed that he must be a creature of Government. In the past year, to his credit, I have become somewhat disabused of that view. I agree with him about D-notices. My right hon. Friends the Members for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) will remember that ever since Harold Wilson got into a terrible fandango with Sammy Lohan, it has been thought that D-notices should be reformed.

For more than 26 years, I have listened to almost every statement made at the Dispatch Box. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), I can recall no occasion on which a senior Minister managed to make a statement about something which, on examination, turned out to be so very different from what it purported to be. To save time, I shall refer the Home Secretary to my question asked on 29 June 1988 at column 374 about paragraph 47 of the White Paper. Also to save time, I shall merely endorse the description of the Ponting trial set out by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). Under the proposed dispensation, Clive Ponting would clearly have been sent to prison.

Paragraph 47 of the White Paper is designed to stymie people who are awkward to the Government and to make jolly sure that there is never a repeat of behaviour towards authority such as that of the Ponting jury. If the Ponting jury was not in the Home Secretary's mind when he made his remark about juries being perverse, what jury did he have in mind?

Paragraph 47 is the precursor of a clause in a Bill which would protect Ministers from being found out if they misbehaved towards Parliament and misled the House of Commons. It is about putting the frighteners on potential deep throats, without whom it is exceedingly difficult for Members of Parliament to call Governments to proper account.

Paragraph 47 makes no distinction between what Sir Frank Cooper has described as genuine security, and political security, but then political embarrassment has always been a far greater spur to action—witness the Zircon case—than the real security interests of our country. The Home Secretary talks about a cornucopia of information coming forward, and a definition of disclosure that is harmful—harmful to whom? The disclosures that seem in the Government's imagination to be harmful are disclosures which embarrass politicians. I thank the Home Secretary for his letter of 21 July. I realise what he is saying about paragraph 47—

> "It is certainly not our view that anyone who might come into contact with members of the services in the course of their duties, still less anyone who might simply see, as part of their work, information emanating from the services, should have the same liability."

I accept that, but designation would be resorted to when Ministers got into a tight corner—when it mattered; when the chips were down.

There are Conservative Members, although they are not present today, who use unparliamentary language about Mr. Ponting. That is their scale of values, but on my scale of values, the most serious crime in public life is direct and calculated lying to the House of Commons to protect a Minister's position. The White Paper protects Ministers from the consequences of lying to the House.

What we now have before us is a charter to help Ministers who need to lie to the House to protect their position and to get away with it. From parliamentary references such as question No. 1 on 23 June 1988 at column 1253, it is widely accepted in the House that the Prime Minister did know about the role of the then Trade Secretary when she set up an inquiry into the leaking of the Law Officer's letter in the Westland affair.

There is a resigned shrug of shoulders and an observation that, after all, "she got away with it". After a quarter of a century in this place, I am not prepared to shrug my shoulders. Deception of the House of Commons is unacceptable behaviour. Would the Prime Minister have dreamed of not designating in the Westland affair Mr. Charles Powell, Mr. Bernard Ingham or Sir Robert Armstrong? If Colette Bowe, John Michell, John Mogg and Sir Brian Hayes had all gone to Sir Philip Woodfield, would they have been designated, and what would have happened to their careers had they done so? We can only speculate on what would have occurred.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent that perhaps the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) is not primarily to blame. However, it is quite wrong that he should go to Brussels while the stigma of blame and deceit and responsibility for the leaking of the Law Officer's letter is attached to him. He should not go if he is not exonerated.

This matter concerns the integrity of our public life. The hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) said, "I think I know why the White Paper is over the top. I say bluntly that it has an all-pervasive influence—the malign influence of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has got away with something else—gross abuse of the Civil Service and the powers of deceit which led through Westland, her role in the miners' strike, the Libyan bombing and the raid on the BBC in Glasgow referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook. It began with a series of events which culminated in the 11 days at the Old Bailey. The Ponting trial, and the White Paper in its present form, would never have come about had not the Prime Minister, in order to protect her position as Prime Minister, insisted—I choose my words extremely carefully—on sustaining a lie to Parliament and not correcting parliamentary answers. Because a particular Prime Minister is an habitual liar to Parliament——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has used an unparliamentary expression. He knows that it is out of order and he must withdraw it.

Mr. Dalyell: I chose the words to get over this extremely carefully. I believe that it is central to the White Paper. I do not want to take up the time of my hon. Friends, so I willingly withdraw if you say——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must not argue with the Chair. He has used an unparliamentary expression and he must withdraw it.

Mr. Dalyell: It is better that I withdraw.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I instruct the hon. Gentleman to withdraw from the Chamber.

1.47 pm

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): In his written evidence to the Franks Committee in 1971, Mr. Justice Caulfield, the judge in the Daily Telegraph secrets case said:

"I think the section"—

that is section 2—

"in its present form could be viciously or capriciously used by an embarrassed Executive."

That is the objection to the package in the current White Paper.

When I listened to the Secretary of State earlier, I was struck by what was almost a tone of vainglorious boasting in his speech. He spoke about an earthquake in Whitehall. I looked at the civil servants behind him and they looked distinctly unquaked. He talked about the information that the Government give out. The point is not the information that the Government want to give out but the information that they do not want to give out, and the extent to which the public should have access to that. Above all, he talked about the White Paper not widening the law. It could scarcely do that. Under the present section 2, there are no fewer than 2,314 listed offences. It will not do for the Secretary of State to boast that the package in the White Paper does not widen the law. That would be scarcely possible.

The question of interception has been thoroughly dealt with by some of my hon. Friends. However, it is worth asking why an exception is made for phone tapping and opening people's letters. No other western country needs such a provision. The White Paper talks rather hypocritically about the importance of not breaching the privacy of private citizens. If phones are being tapped by the Government it ill-behoves them to say that they do not want information given out because they are worried about the privacy of private citizens.

The Government justify making a blanket exception of phone tapping and mail opening on the grounds of terrorism, crime and national security. I suggest that the phone tapping and mail opening is done not because they are worried about those things, but because they are worried about exposure of phone tapping that has nothing to do with national security, crime or terrorism.

I shall now turn to the absence of a public interest defence in the White Paper. The Government justify the absence of such a defence by saying that it is not the practice to take motive into account in matters of law. That is a perverse statement because section 1 of the Official Secrets Act, which is not to be abolished, explicitly takes motive into account. It is surely perverse to say that the motive for passing on secrets is admissible if a person will be proved guilty but inadmissible if someone is trying to prove himself innocent.

Conservative Members know perfectly well that there is a long standing common law defence against actions for breach of confidence on the grounds of public interest. In the discredited section 2 of the Official Secrets Act there is even an implicit defence in terms of the public interest. This is what the Government seek explicitly to rule out. Conservative Members talk about civil servants who are worried about what they will be asked to do and say that all they have to do is to refer things up the ladder. That is nonsense. If a hapless higher executive officer or Home Office principal is instructed to do things that are against the public interest, his instructions will have to come down the chain from, perhaps, a permanent secretary or an assistant secretary. It is absurd to say that the matter can be referred back up the chain and to say so shows a lack of understanding of the realities of life for the groundlings in the Civil Service.

Behind the public interest matter is the shadow of what some of us thought was the most serious aspect of the Ponting case—the Government's assumption that there is no distinction between the interest of the state and the interests of the Government. That is what the judgment showed in the Ponting case and it is dangerous. That assumption is the reason for the Government not allowing a public interest defence. That is contrary to traditions of common law and fairness and to the interests of the nation as a whole.

I shall now deal with the blanket exclusion for life of members of the security services who will be deprived of their ordinary civil liberty to speak about things that they know. It is worth reading the White Paper closely on this matter. It says that members of the security services are to lose all their civil rights because any allegations by them carry credibility. What are the Government saying? Are they saying that it is acceptable to leak false secrets but not to talk about things that may be true? They say that they will withdraw civil liberties from members of the security services because otherwise public confidence in the secret services may be reduced.

If the Government are interested in building public confidence in the secret services the way forward for them is not to reduce civil liberties but to recruit and manage properly and, possibly, give members of the security services proper pensions. Far from being worried that disclosures by the security services will reduce public confidence in those services, the Government are worried that past and future disclosures by the security services might reduce public confidence in the Government.

I should like to quote no less an authority than Chapman Pincher whom E. P. Thompson called that conduit into which the establishment leaks. In his evidence to the Franks Committee, he said:

"In my experience, which as I say is a long one, 'politically embarrassing' is always a much higher security classification than 'top secret'."

The Government should spare us the cant of being worried about public confidence in the security services. They are worried about what present or ex-Security Service members might say that would damage confidence in the Government.

The life-long duty of confidentiality that the Government are trying to impose on Security Service members cannot truly be achieved this side of the iron curtain. The Government are trying to impose an iron curtain on past and present members of the security services, and that is what makes their behaviour so deplorable.

The right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) said it was an ingenious White Paper. It is ingenious because the hapless draftsmen have gone through every embarrassing security incident of the past 10 years and tried to draw up a White Paper to ensure that they will never happen again. That is why the White Paper is so incoherent and why it bears no references to the carefully worked out arguments of the 1971 Franks report.

In its opening chapter, the Franks report said:

[Ms. Diane Abbott]

"A government which pursues secret aims, or which operates in greater secrecy than the effective conduct of its proper functions requires or which turns information services into propaganda agencies, will lose the trust of the people."

Nothing in the White Paper will enhance the trust of the people in the Government. It is an ill-argued and incoherent White Paper. Labour Members sincerely hope that when legislation is brought forward the issues that we have raised, especially the public interest defence, will be considered carefully by the Government.

1.56 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): I shall be brief because of the pressure of time. I shall not refer to the detail of the White Paper because it has been dealt with excellently by my hon. Friends.

The Secretary of State gave a lyrical presentation about the Government opening doors and unleashing information. In an intervention, I asked what new information would be revealed by the White Paper. His reply was that it was not a Freedom of Information Act. I suspect that means that there are no significant libertarian elements included in it.

The state and its corporate control have grown alarmingly in the past year, as we saw in the measures with which we dealt in the past week. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) mentioned the 1688 tercentenary celebrations, a Bill of Rights and the checks, balances and liberty of the constitution. This week, we have dealt with the final stages of the Education Reform Bill and the poll tax legislation and are now discussing this White Paper. There could be no more sinister combination of elements that reveal the degree of state centralisation that has taken place. The hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) said that there was less state control and less scope for state secrecies because of the privatisation programme. Under the Education Reform Bill, the power of the Secretary of State for Education and Science is considerably expanded. The poll tax legislation contains a sinister set of measures that will affect civil liberties and democratic rights. Local government will finally become a creature of the state and will have little scope to take measures of its own. Civil liberties will be attacked considerably by the poll tax registrar, who will be able to raid all types of sensitive information. Even the right of petition, which the House of Commons enjoys without duress, is under threat because it has been said in the House that petitions about the poll tax could be used against the petitioners because their names could be entered in the poll tax register.

There is also the threat of national identity cards, which was suggested during the debate on the poll tax and a number of Government Members in Committee were adamant that they were in favour of such a card. The poll tax Bill also fixes the franchise by affecting registration and it will affect the fate of local election results. People will have to pay poll tax to qualify to vote. Those measures and the White Paper will give such authority to the state that we shall be in a very sinister position.

This has been a dangerous week. We have been celebrating the events of 1688, but we may not be able to do that in future.

2.2 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): It will have been noticed that the previous three speakers have been Opposition Members. On this occasion, the Government have run out of enemies to the White Paper. Congratulations for the debate and for the White Paper rest not with the Government but with the hon. Member —I am tempted to say hon. Friend in this context—for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). He, more than any other Member in the House through his effort and determination, has provoked the Government into publishing the White Paper.

The debate has demonstrated yet again that behind the honeyed words of the Home Secretary and his public relations staff is the reality of a White Paper that, in many senses, is as harsh and illiberal as the Act it seeks to replace. In essence, it proposes to replace a large net with large holes with a smaller net with smaller holes more effectively to catch and silence those who cause the Government embarrassment. The White Paper rejects the idea of a ministerial certificate and says loftily that such matters will be left to the courts.

Would that that were true. The courts will not be allowed to decide whether large areas of information can be made known. The Government are putting a stronger fence around six broad areas of information and will leave the courts to decide simply on the extent of any damage that the release of information may cause, or is likely to cause.

The White Paper is repressive in its denial of any public interest defence. What possible harm to security did Clive Ponting do when he told my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that the Government had misled the House over the sinking of the Belgrano? Did that damage security? He caused embarrassment to the Government and the Prime Minister but that is no reason to deny people who act in good faith a public interest defence. Surely the public as represented by a jury, is a better judge of public interest than any Government. That is what the Home Secretary should have meant when he spoke of leaving it to the courts.

It was a serving officer who leaked secret information about the run-down state of our defences in the 1930s to a Member of Parliament called Winston Churchill. Did not he and the people of this country have a right to know that? That officer did no more than Clive Ponting did 50 years later. That illustrates the need for a better definition of exclusion of defence, security and intelligence information.

Ministers refused to confirm or deny the arrival of American cruise missiles at Greenham Common and Molesworth on security grounds. When Sarah Tisdall bravely made that known, she was convicted for her pains and the Government still refused to give that information or any information about the numbers involved. It took the arrival here this week of 20 inspectors from the Soviet Union, under the terms of an intermediate-range nuclear forces treaty signed between two foreign powers, to let the people of Britain know that the number of operational missiles at Greenham is 96 and at Molesworth 18. Fancy that—the Russians can know how many American missiles are down the road from the House but we cannot, and nothing in the White Paper will assist us in getting such information in the future.

The mind boggles at the blanket cover of information given in confidence by foreign Governments and international organisations. What happens when a draft directive on potato sizes is sent from Brussels? Usually, the Departments concerned with such directives consult the trade and other interests on these matters. Under the terms of the White Paper, that passing round of bits of paper with a still secret draft directive would be illegal. Or would it? At the back of this is a collossal uncertainty, because the Attorney-General stands in the wings and he decides, on behalf of the Government, whether to prosecute. This is not clearing up the catch-all mess of section 2—it is nonsensically compounding it.

Let us take the example of information useful to criminals, dealt with in paragraph 52 of the White Paper. Yesterday, a newspaper rang me to ask me to comment on news that the Bromsgrove and Redditch police force, in the west midlands, was restricting panda patrols to no more than 25 miles a day because it is denied the money that it needs to give the service that it would like to give to the public. Is that information useful to criminals? It could be held to be so. What about the number of police in a division? I expect that the criminals would love to know that. Again, who would be caught? The White Paper gives us no clues about this, because it says in paragraph 71 that it is for the Minister to decide what information is to be revealed.

Another example is interception or phone tapping. What damage to our security did Cathy Massister, a former MI5 agent, do when she revealed that the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament had had its phones illegally tapped and its offices burgled? That did not damage security—It damaged a Government who are careless of their control over the security services. The matter is even worse, because under the White Paper anyone publishing this information would have no public interest defence, although one clearly exists.

Comedy becomes farce when we get to the denial of the prior publication defence. The world may know, but we cannot. The Home Secretary has forgotten his excitement for the fast-developing wizardry that whisks news and information round this planet in a twinkling. How does he propose to stop that publication by satellite? How is he to decide who published first, second or third, and where? If a news bulletin goes out by a satellite as it spins around aloft, there are time zone differences that will get the Government into trouble. The decision is not just wrong. It is impracticable and that is why, in the end, he will have to drop it and allow for a prior publication defence.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) that this is a matter that should be judged by Parliament as the elected voice of the people, because it is we who stand on the side of the people against the Government. At the heart of the debate is a simple issue—the right of free people in a free society to know what an elected Government are doing in their name. That is the essence of democracy. It will not do for the Government to say, as they do, "This is a secret because we say that it is a secret." That is what undemocratic Governments around the world do. We should state and assert that a free people in a democratic society have a right to know what is going on, save only about those specialist matters that touch upon our proper security.

This is where the White Paper fails. There is its coy admission in paragraph 5 that > "It does not . . . address such matters as the question of access to official information not covered by the Government's proposals."

That is what is missing and that is what is wrong. It is not about widening access to information so that the governed can know more about what those who govern are up to. The Government do not trust the people, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) said.

Information released from the ambit of the criminal law will not become more accessible. There will simply be different penalties for its release, such as the loss of jobs and pension rights for those in the Civil Service who release it. That is not progress. It is simply a change of direction to serve the same prohibitive purposes. When the Bill comes before us, we shall seek to amend the proposals substantially. In Government, we shall review them in the context of a Freedom of Information Act to which we shall give priority and which is the proper setting in which to consider guarding our legitimate secrets.

2.10 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): I recall that a previous Labour Administration made such pledges, but did not keep them. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) was extremely generous in foreshortening the time that he had to make his wind-up speech in the interests of letting everyone who wanted to speak in the debate do so. I have done the same regarding the length of time for my wind-up speech. It must have been that extremely short period of time that accounted for the fact that the hon. Member for Erdington did not have the time to compare and contrast the excellent advances made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's White Paper with anything that was put forward by the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979.

I wish to make two quick reflections regarding matters outside this Chamber. First—I exonerate any hon. Member who has spoken today from this—some people outside the Chamber, particularly newspaper commentators, still appear to be breaking their lances on the fears and rumours in print and on television about what the White Paper might have contained, rather than addressing what it says. Today, the proposals have been examined in great detail by all hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. Alas, that is not the case with so many commentators who mould public opinion.

Secondly, many hon. Members are passionately, rightly and deeply concerned about the issue, including the right hon. Members for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and for Morly and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), who has now left to fulfil a constituency engagement, as he courteously told us, and my hon. Friends the Members for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). We in Government are deeply concerned and fascinated by all the ins and outs and nuances. I represent a constituency that contains a university, and it strikes me as extraordinary that neither I nor my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary or other Ministers have received any letters from people outside. That may also be true of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James). We must, therefore, keep our debates in the House in perspective.

I do not think that my speech deserves to be called a peroration. I should like, however, to make immediately the points that I would normally make at about 2.29 pm, because it is important that I should tell the House what will happen next before I respond in detail to as many of the points as possible. Not every dot and comma of the proposals for the Bill has been set in concrete. The debate would have served no purpose if we had taken that view. There is ample scope for discussion of the proposals and my right hon. Friend and I have listened with great care and interest to all the comments and suggestions that have been made today. We have not agreed with them all, but guided by many of them. They will inform the way in which the future legislation is drafted. We shall have to consider a number of ideas. Next Friday, there will be a debate in the other place on exactly this issue. We would then wish to have some time to reflect on what has been said in this House and in the other place and to consider other comments that have been put to us by interested bodies and individuals although, as I have said, the weight of correspondence coming in to the Home Office on this issue is tiny.

We do not intend to let the matter rest. When my right hon. Friend first announced our intention last December to produce the White Paper, he said that it would be followed by early legislation, and his White Paper repeats that undertaking. Once we have had that time—I dare say that it will not be too long—we shall set to work to prepare legislation with the intention of laying it before Parliament as soon as possible. The White Paper contains the Government's proposals, but we must remember—the Government will remember—that it is Parliament which will decide whether these or other proposals flowing from them should be translated into the law of the United Kingdom. We shall certainly not forget that.

The debate has taken us an important step nearer the reform of something that we all agree needs pressing reform. In the remaining 15 minutes, I shall reply to the comments that have been made although inevitably in this short time, I shall be unable to reply to every point. I turn first to the extraordinary speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). I shall try to pick up five of the points that he made. I turn first to his point about designation, which was a point which also concerned my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) in an early intervention and in his speech——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was ordered to withdraw from the Chamber. That means for the remainder of this day's sitting——

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a matter of great concern to the House. Now that the information has come through about the appointment of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan)——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was instructed to withdraw from the Chamber because he refused to withdraw an unparliamentary remark. That means that he must withdraw for the remainder of this day's sitting. I must instruct the hon. Gentleman to withdraw from the Chamber for the remainder of this day's sitting.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is an experienced parliamentarian. I repeat that I instructed him to withdraw an unparliamentary expression. He refused to do so and he was instructed to withdraw from the Chamber. That means for the remainder of this day's sitting. The hon. Gentleman must withdraw.

Mr. Dalyell: Parliament has been so affronted by the appointment of the right hon. and learned Member——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I give the hon. Gentleman one further chance, otherwise I shall have to take further action.

Mr. Dalyell: In that case, I must withdraw. The affront to Parliament of the appointment of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks who took part in the debate without being exonerated in relation to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.
The hon. Member then withdrew.

Mr. Patten: As it happens, when the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) appeared in the Chamber I was about to mention his name because he, too, was interested in the issue of designation. Perhaps I should take this opportunity to condemn in the strongest words available to me the monstrous attack that was made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow on my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. To call my right hon. Friend "a habitual liar" without any signs of protest from those behind him is an utter disgrace. It is an abuse of the House and I am afraid that it is an abuse of the House that is repeated consistently by the hon. Member for Linlithow. Time and again he accuses my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of the things of which he has accused her today and then, under some guise or another, withdraws. It is time that that was stopped.

Mr. Ted Garrett: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. With respect, you have made a ruling and in my judgment and that of my colleagues, that is the end of that particular episode this morning. You should not allow the Minister to continue in that way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is wise advice I am sure that the Minister is moving on.

Mr. Patten: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The right hon. Member or Sparkbrook was concerned about designation. He was worried about paragraph 47 in the White Paper where he spotted the words "groups" and "list". He thought that that would mean that there would be universal classification of people according to their category of job. However, he did not read on through paragraph 48. I will quote less selectively than the right hon. Gentleman from paragraph 48 which states:

> "But the persons concerned would be notified individually; and criminal liability would attach only after the individual officer concerned had received notification of his liability."

Each individual will be designated individually.

I suppose that from time to time there are expressions for a group of people. I suggest that a group of principal private secretaries might be called a discretion of principal private secretaries. Perhaps we may refer to them as a group, but each of them acts as a conduit of information from the services to their Secretaries of State and they will be designated individually if that is the decision of the Minister as set out in the White Paper.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was also concerned about certain earlier cases. I do not remember them all as I did not write them down, but they will be on the record. He asked whether the revelations would be authorised in the different cases to which he referred. I cannot give a clear answer to that because I cannot speculate on exactly what legislation the White Paper will lead to because the Bill is not drafted. Therefore, I cannot speculate on the decisions that will be taken by the responsible Ministers. However, I can speculate to the extent that I suspect that bits would have been authorised, but other bits would not. [Interruption.] The interesting bits.

Mr. Alex Carlile: That exposes the whole fallacy.

Mr. Patten: The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) says from a sedentary position that that somehow exposes matters. It has been the practice for many years for decent people who have been in the services who want to write to seek authority to do so. They have been given authority for some things and denied it for others. That was the only point that I wanted to make.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook referred to the role of the staff counsellor. Sir Philip Woodfield is not a member of the service. His successors will not be members of the service. They are independent and act as a conduit to Ministers.

The hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) was concerned about telephone tapping. In his interesting speech based on personal experience he admitted that there is protection in the Interception of Communications Act 1985. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook forcefully raised the issue of "Spycatcher". That was also referred to by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) and other right hon. and hon. Members that a former member of the services should keep his or her counsel. Members should not break a lifelong duty of confidentiality without authorisation. That is a clear principle which underlies the White Paper.

Finally, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was charmingly concerned about the welfare of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and about what happened when he went into purdah each year to discuss business concerned with the Budget. I do not believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will ever need the protection of criminal law under any circumstances. However, Budget leaks about alleged changes in tax codes, and so on, are not protected by criminal law. The only matters that will be are items of information coming from a source connected with my right hon. Friend and falling within one of the categories covered by the Bill, such as international relations.

Mr. Hattersley: As the Minister and others questioned the rule of confidentiality and its legal back-up in respect of Budget matters, I had inquiries made, and I am advised there are so many laws covering that aspect that, were I to list them all, the Minister would not be able to rise to his feet again before four o'clock. Perhaps the Minister will look at the Taxes Management Act 1970, the Finance Act 1972 and the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 —all of which require certain aspects of Budget policy to be maintained in secrecy. There are many more examples, covering almost every aspect of the Chancellor's day-to-day activities.

Mr. Patten: The right hon. Gentleman has clearly been doing his research, because earlier in the debate he was challenged to name all the laws to which he was referring but failed to do so.

I turn to points raised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his extremely distinguished speech—it was exactly the kind of speech one would expect from someone who was such a distinguished Home Secretary. I welcome the warm reception he gave to my right hon. Friend's White Paper, which was reflected by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminister, North. I welcome also the sentiment of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks, based on deep experience, that there is no longer any need for a public interest defence because the Government have circumvented that by the White Paper's proposals. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills disagrees, but I much agree with that argument. I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's reaffirmation of the lifelong duty of those in the services, though I differ from him in the need that he sees for expressing decisions on whether a publication should be allowed through a mechanism involving independent persons or an independent body.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills raised points concerning media reporting of disclosure by members of the services and the question whether the test of harm applies. There may be circumstances—and I choose my words carefully—where, for example, there is collusion between a member or former member of the security and intelligence services and a newspaper, where the newspaper could be an accessory to an offence committed by that member or former security services member—and "could" is the operative word. However, if the newspaper simply reported a disclosure that had been made on a separate occasion, the prosecution would have to prove that it was the newspaper's disclosure, and not that made by the member or former member of the services, that was likely to damage the operation of the security and intelligence services.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: What about television?

Mr. Patten: I am reminded by my hon Friend that I forgot the broadcasting media. There would be a test of harm, and it would be that the journalist—whether he worked in broadcasting or in newspapers—knew or had reasonable cause to believe that his disclosure was likely to cause harm.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills expressed concern that the Government have not yet provided a list of international organisations that require information in confidence. A large number of organisations have an international dimension, and in the past many of them have supplied in confidence certain details to this or previous Governments. I dare say that they include the Ghana cocoa marketing board, which was the particular example given by my hon. Friend.

[Mr. Patten]

It would be difficult at this stage to drag out all the names from files going back many years, and I do not believe that it would serve any useful purpose. We must address the issue when we translate the White Paper concept into legislation. We are debating a White Paper; we are not at the end of a Second Reading debate on a Bill. All will be revealed on its publication, which I hope will be as soon as possible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills——

It being half past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 26th July, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 15 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), Motions in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Social Security may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and a half hours after the first of them has been entered upon; and if proceedings thereon have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall then put successively the Question already proposed from the Chair and the Questions on such of the remaining Motions as may then be made.

That, at the sitting on Wednesday 27th July, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1)(b) of Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business) and Standing Order No. 15 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)), Motions in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Building Societies, Education and Immigration, in the name of Mr. Secretary Hurd relating to Police, and in the name of Mr. Secretary Channon relating to Social Legislation relating to Road Transport may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and half hours after each of them has been entered upon, and if proceedings thereon have not been entered upon, and if proceedings thereon have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall, at the expiration of that period, put forthwith the Question thereon.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for intervening at this point, because I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) has an important Adjournment debate. It seems, however, that we are in some difficulty.

Under the Representation of the People Acts, the acceptance of an office of profit under the Crown means that an hon. Member automatically demits his seat as a Member of the House. According to a report today by the Press Association, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) has informed the Prime Minister in the past few days that he will take on the £95,000 a year post of Vice-President and Commissioner in the European Economic Community. It seems to me that when he said that he would accept that, he had accepted an office of profit under the Crown and was therefore no longer entitled to sit in the House, let alone speak in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It is not possible for me to adjudicate on the matter now, but due note will be taken of the point that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Cancer Treatment (North Wales)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): My subject is cancer. One in three women in Wales still smoke, despite widespread health warnings. I am told that, according to a survey, one in four new cases of lung cancer now being registered in Wales is a woman. That is almost double the rate of 15 years ago. The survey warns that the incidence of lung cancer among women will continue to increase over the next 30 years, and nearly 500 new cases of lung cancer among women are being diagnosed in the Principality each year.

I believe that the Minister's Department says that the most marked increase is in lung cancer in females. That has been attributed to the increase in cigarette smoking among women since the second world war. The increase is in sharp contrast to the position among males, where the incidence has either remained constant or has fallen very slightly in men under 75.

As long ago as 27 June 1984, the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs considered cancer treatment in north Wales. Evidence was given by the Health and social work department of the Welsh Office, distinguished medical representatives, the DHSS and the Mersey regional health authority. A Welsh Office memo stated:

"access to Radiotherapy is more difficult."

The same memo instanced the "distance and expense of travelling."

During the examination of witnesses, the chief medical officer pointed to higher mortality ratios for cancers in the Gwynedd area than for Wales as a whole. The evidence stated that patients from north Wales went to Clatterbridge hospital in Mersey and to Christie hospital in Manchester for radiotherapy and subsequent chemotherapy. The waiting time for treatment increased, especially between 1978 and 1982. There is a history of travel for treatment for cancer, and at one period there was concern over the waiting time for treatment. There has also been concern in the past about the shortage of either staff or cash or both to meet the needs of those requiring the excellent treatment that is given.

The Select Committee examined witnesses in 1984 but it was only in the summer of 1988 that a firm of consultants, Deloitte Haskins and Sells, was invited to undertake a study of cancer services in north Wales, including the provision of a radiotherapy centre in north Wales. Four years is too long to set up a consultants' study. Cancer is a terrible affliction. It hurts whole families. I want at least a satellite radiotherapy centre to be established in north Wales, and one is suspicious when progress, admittedly in the right direction, takes four years.

I do not intend to criticise the Clwyd health authority. I pay tribute to the quality of treatment that is given to my constituents and to others. I know that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales is committed to obtaining the best possible deal for my constituents and for others in north Wales. However, I emphasise that progress has been too slow. Even though a study by consultants is now under way, there is no guarantee whatsoever that a satellite radiotherapy centre in north Wales will be established.

I wonder whether bureaucracy is the reason for the slow progress. It took a long time for the Gwynedd, Clwyd, Powys, Shropshire and Wolverhampton health authorities, as well as the Mersey, North-West and West Midlands regional health authorities to seek to co-operate with and agree the terms of reference for the consultancy study. I want to know whether the consultancy study is literally under way and when it is expected to report. What is its status? When it has been completed, will the report go direct to the Secretary of State for Wales or will it go first to the authorities that I have mentioned? If the report goes first to the authorities, I foresee further delays.

Is genuine hostel accommodation provided at Clatterbridge for patients who have travelled from north Wales? Even after having perused the Select Committee's report, I am not sure of the answer to that question. Are there enough radiotherapy staff at Clatterbridge hospital? Is the Minister able to say categorically that the Gwynedd and Clwyd health authorities are collaborating well with their counterparts over the border, especially with the Mersey regional health authority? Has the Welsh Office paid any money to the Mersey regional health authority and to Clatterbridge for the services that it obtains for its north Wales patients? If I cannot be given the answers to those questions now, I should be grateful if the Minister would write to me at length at his convenience during the next few weeks?

The minutes of evidence attached to the Select Committee's 1984 report included a reference by Dr. H. Parry to a wait of six weeks for radiotherapy treatment while patients were in pain. Has that problem been solved? I presume that it has. I hope that nobody now suffers pain because of having to wait for treatment.

Dr. Coe was also examined by the Select Committee in 1984. He said that, wherever the north Wales radiotherapy centre is sited, it must be on the site of a district general hospital. Four anxious years have passed since Dr. Coe said that, with all that that entails for patients and families. I ask the Welsh Office to show a sense of urgency. I am asking for decisive action and a guarantee of meaningful development when the consultants report. I hope that the Minister will use his undoubted influence to ensure that the consultants reply with their study urgently. My request is for a satellite radiotherapy centre if we cannot have an independent centre. I concede that the former is more likely. I would listen to expert advice on that.

I am aware of the problems for patients who receive chemotherapy treatment and have to travel a long way to get it. Patients from Corwen, for example, have to travel to the world-famous Christie hospital in Manchester. That is a long journey. Apart from the upset and trauma caused by the treatment, the people concerned are likely to be sick as a result of the long journey. I know that the Minister will be sensitive to the humanity of the issues that I am raising and I am sure he will respond accordingly. Patients from the Rhyl area have to travel to Clatterbridge. Some radiotherapy patients receive treatment locally, but the majority have to travel to Manchester.

It would be helpful if a consultant from Liverpool or Manchester could hold clinic sessions at say Ysbyty Glan Clwyd, which is the great district hospital at Bodelwyddan near Rhyl, or at Ysbyty Maclor, the district hospital at Wrexham, each week. Better still, a consultant could be appointed for north Wales, holding sessions at Bangor, Wrexham and Rhyl Bodelwyddan. The consultants at Wrexham appreciate the expertise that is to be found at Christie's in Manchester. The Minister knows that it is a world-renowned hospital. The consultants at Wrexham would hate to lose their contacts with it, but it would be helpful to have more local treatment.

How many hospices are there in north Wales for the care of the terminally ill? On Deeside, some devoted people, who are my constituents, are very effectively collecting cash for a hospice outside the constituency at Backford near Chester. When, eventually, the proposed Deeside community hospital is built, does the Minister envisage the existing small community hospital at Mancot becoming a hospice run by Clwyd health authority? Does he know that, in Clwyd, there are fears that financial difficulties facing south Manchester health authority might lead to a reduction of the services provided by clinical staff at Christie's hospital? If that were to happen, it would be a blow to my constituents and the whole of north Wales.

If that were to happen, it would be a blow to my constituents and the whole of north Wales.

There is barely a district hospital manager and treasurer who does not have pressing financial problems, but I should like some assurances, if not now perhaps in a letter. My local council—Alyn and Deeside—Connah's Quay town council and others support, the campaign for at least a satellite radiotherapy centre. The Minister is aware of my disappointment and anger about the substantial delay with the building of a community hospital at Aston Deeside. It has been delayed by three years, and it has been scaled down in the number of beds and the proposed services to my constituents. The community that I represent is very upset at this development, but we have had this out previously. I emphasise that my constituents have no district general hospital, despite a huge urban population. That is an injustice to my constituents, who are always travelling to Manchester, to Liverpool, to Rhyl, to Wrexham and to Chester.

It has nothing to do with the Minister or with this Administration, but, historically, Deeside missed out a generation of growth. So be it, but I now want guarantees, not only for the radiotherapy centre, but for more funding for the excellent Clwyd health authority. If that authority had specific extra cash, it would be able to buy more of the time of the superbly experienced consultants at Manchester Christie. My constituents would benefit greatly and speedily. They could be treated at Wrexham by consultants from Manchester more often.

I also want a special cash subvention to provide better back-up services locally concerning cancer. That subvention would be made available for more social work, more health visitors and more Macmillan nurses. I conclude my remarks so that the Minister may respond to me and then get his helicopter back to Wales.

2.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist): I thank the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) for his good wishes for my second chance to experience that form of aerial transport.

I congratulate him on his choice of topic for this afternoon's debate and I shall be writing to him in reply to his many detailed questions. He will know from exchanges in the past that my right hon. Friend and I attach a very high priority to the development of specialist services for patients in north Wales, particularly for those suffering from cancer. It is a much feared group of diseases by virtue of its indiscriminate impact on young and old and by the difficulty—and as yet on occasion the impossibility—of successful treatment.

In responding to the hon. Gentleman's speech I hope to reassure the House that the Welsh Office has a coherent strategy for tackling cancer in north Wales. It is a strategy for securing better information, of promoting health education, providing targeted screening facilities and reappraising and developing diagnostic and treatment services. Much of that strategy is already in place and the rest is coming to fruition. There is certainly no lack of commitment either of effort or resources to provide what is required. I am much encouraged that in pursuing our strategy in north Wales we have had strong support not just from the Welsh health authorities but from those in England which are most directly concerned. The hon. Gentleman will understand that I cannot speak for those services which lie across the border, but he can be assured that Welsh Office officials maintain close contact with the English health authorities.

The availability of impartial and objective statistical information on the incidence of cancers is of prime importance in tackling the many and complex issues that they present to us. We have been very fortunate for many years in Wales in having a highly regarded unit whose principal function has been to provide the soundest possible data and to publish them in the public interest. I refer to the Welsh Cancer Registry which is responsible for the cancer registration scheme in Wales. It collects information on an entirely confidential basis about cancer patients resident in the Principality and its third report entitled "Cancer Registration in Wales 1974-84" was published earlier this month. The report contains a detailed analysis of the numbers and incidence of cancer for Welsh residents in each of the years 1974-84. It is our intention that the latest report of the registry should be given the most careful consideration, not only within my own Department but by all those involved in dealing with cancers in the Principality.

I shall not attempt to describe all the main features of the registry's latest report. I will say that, if no allowance is made for changes in the age and sex composition of the population, the number of cancer registrations in Wales expressed as a rate per 100,000 has increased by about 30 per cent. between 1974 and 1984. Of course, cancers are naturally prevalent amongst the elderly and more people are living longer in Wales than they were in 1974. Allowing for changes in the composition of the population as a whole, the overall incidence of malignancies over the period 1974-1984 has remained broadly constant for men, although as the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside has said, for women the incidence has increased. It is clear that, aside from changes in demography, increased numbers of registrations may also be due to improvements in diagnosis and in the reporting of diagnosed cases to the registry. Naturally, improvements are made to the system of reporting wherever necessary and desirable. It is important to keep that in mind when interpreting the data.

The pattern of distribution for cancers in the Principality varies for each type of malignancy. Speaking very broadly and taking all malignancies together, I can tell the House that in north Wales rates appear to be elevated compared with what one would expect for Wales as a whole. This is not the case for every type of cancer or for every area in north Wales, as the mapped illustrations in the registry document show.

Such evidence as we have suggests that the incidence of cancer in north Wales has been above average over many decades. It is not clear why this should be. It is possibly an effect of the changing demographic profile caused by people retiring to the area but the causes and correlations are extremely difficult to pin down.

Last year we commissioned Emeritus Professor Hubert Campbell to undertake an investigation of the data relating to the incidence of cancer on the north Wales coast for 1974 to 1983. Professor Campbell has provided an analysis of the results of his investigation. He makes it clear that in his view there is nothing new in the reported incidence of cancers in north Wales; he notes that the high incidence has been known for at least 70 years. Professor Campbell's report is very full. I do not propose to describe its contents in detail today, but I hope shortly to be able to make a statement about it.

There can be no question that some cancers are, as the hon. Gentleman said, substantially preventable. One need only reflect on the levels of smoking and the incidence of lung cancer among women in Wales to see the point. It is heartening that through the Welsh Health Promotion Authority we have been able significantly to enlarge the investment in health education for Wales. This is vital to help the public make informed choices about lifestyle. It is crucial for prompting people to set smoking aside and for sponsoring sensible moderation in drinking, sound diet, beneficial exercise and individual responsibility for overall health maintenance. In all this the authority works actively with the voluntary sector, with the network of health education officers in district health authorities, and with many others to carry the message to schools, the workplace, and to people throughout the Principality.

Complementary to these health education initiatives is the Government's commitment to early diagnosis and treatment. That is particularly true of the national screening arrangements for cancer of the cervix and breast.

Discussion of prevention, incidence and causation naturally leads on to the facilities that are currently available to diagnose and treat patients in north Wales. In doing so we must not overlook the considerable advances that have been made in recent years in treating the disease. The Bagshawe report on acute services for cancer reminds us that:

> "Lengthening periods of survival show that even where it is not possible to cure cancer it is increasingly feasible to offer treatment to contain its effects and development."

That is achievable particularly through the development of new drug therapies, more sophisticated radiotherapy and the development of computerised treatment planning.

Our task is to ensure that patients throughout Wales have ready access to these facilities as quickly as doctors believe is clinically necessary. That process begins with diagnosis. The diagnosis of cancer is undertaken by clinical specialists at district general hospitals on referral from general practitioners and our strategy to make computerised tomography screening more accessible to patients in Wales has done much to enhance diagnosis. About £1 million has been invested by the Department in scanners at Ysbyty Glan Clwyd, Rhyl and Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor. This investment has clear benefits for early identification of cancer.

The treatment of patients suffering from cancer may take the form of surgery, medical oncology or radiotherapy or a combination of these. Surgical treatment in north Wales, as elsewhere, is provided as a district-based service carried out by surgeons in district general hospitals. As such, it is the responsibility of district health authorities to plan and fund these services within their financial resources and according to the extent of local need.

Medical oncology, which is the treatment of cancer by drugs, is also provided as a district service at district general hospitals. However, medical oncology may be combined with radiotherapy treatment and, if so, is usually then provided at the regional radiotherapy centre which treats the patient. I shall return to the implication that has for district health authorities in Wales.

Radiotherapy treatment is recognised throughout England and Wales as a regional service provided at regional radiotherapy centres. Those centres, which have for many years provided north Wales patients with radiotherapy treatment or radiotherapy combined with medical oncology treatment, are the radiotherapy and oncology centre at Clatterbridge hospital, Wirral; Alderhay hospital, Liverpool; Christie hospital, Manchester; and the Linden-Davies radiotheraphy unit for Shropshire and mid Wales at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital.

As the hon. Gentleman said, consultants based at Clatterbridge and Christie hospitals hold out-patient clinics. A complex network of services already exists to provide patients with a comprehensive service of diagnosis and treatment. This may be available locally or may require the resources of a regional radiotherapy unit with equipment such as linear accelerators, cobalt machines and computerised tomography scanning and treatment-planning facilities. It is a part of medicine that has experienced significant technical advances and expansion of treatment activity. As the hon. Gentleman said, from 1984 to 1986 the Department conducted a review of regional services to north Wales patients, including radiotherapy and oncology services. That review was prompted, in part, by anxiety about the service being provided for north Wales' patients.

The findings of the working party's comprehensive study were the subject of consultation in 1986, in the light of which the then Secretary of State for Wales announced in April 1987 his decision on the action to be taken.

With regard to radiotherapy and oncology the working party review made several recommendations, and I shall refer to the most important.

In respect of the Christie hospital, it proposed that arrangements for the treatment of patients from south Clwyd should continue. We have sought to secure this and have been assured by the general manager of South Manchester health authority that potential restrictions in clinical services provided at Christie hospital, which have been publicised subsequently and which might have implications for radiotherapy treatment for north Wales patients, were not to be introduced. This will ensure the maintenance of the service.

The review team were concerned to ensure provision, through Welsh Office funding, of fast, comfortable transport to and from the regional radiotherapy centre at Clatterbridge for those patients who have to travel very long distances—that is, those from the western parts of Gwynedd. This proposal was willingly accepted. Capital funds of £75,000, together with recurrent funding of nearly £97,000, were made available in 1987 to Gwynedd health authority to acquire fast, comfortable transport, and I am pleased to learn that this has done much to ease the conditions of sick patients who must travel long distances for radiotherapy treatment.

One issue to which the review team gave particular attention was whether north Wales should have its own satellite radiotherapy centre. It concluded that the Welsh Office should undertake a detailed feasibility study, including site options, regarding the provision of a satellite radiotherapy centre linked to the main unit at Clatterbridge, but located within north Wales, and that discussions should take place with Mersey RHA to solicit the co-operation of the regional centre to support the running of this unit, which should be funded by the Welsh Office as part of its regional services.

The consultation process, to which I referred earlier, revealed some disagreement about the appropriateness of a satellite radiotherapy centre located in north Wales. Being concerned that the treatment of cancer patients in north Wales, whether by surgery, radiotherapy or medical oncology, should be developed in a rational and comprehensive manner, the then Secretary of State decided that the most appropriate way forward was a comprehensive examination of the provision of cancer services in north Wales, at district and regional levels. Accordingly, discussions were initiated with the interested English and Welsh health authorities to seek their co-operation in a consultancy study to examine the provision of cancer services in north Wales.

I am pleased to say that we received a strongly supportive response in each case and proceeded to select a company to undertake the study. We were particularly pleased to have the assistance of the district general manager of Clwyd health authority, Dr. Jones. The study is to be started in the next four weeks. It will report to the Secretary of State after consultations with district health authorities. We have set the date of January 1989 for the receipt of its findings. Officials of the Welsh Office met representatives of Deloitte, Haskins and Sells this week at the start of their work.

The consultancy study is expected to be completed early in the coming year. It will entail a detailed exploration of the incidence of cancer, the treatment infrastructure, clinical developments and treatment requirements. Following that, it will be expected to explore how these requirements can most effectively be met and to undertake an appraisal of the options to meet them, including the feasibility of providing a radiotherapy centre in north Wales. That demanding remit will be carried out in close consultation with clinicians and officers of north Wales health authorities and of English regional health authorities, which at present provide the service. It can be expected that those groups representing patients will also be involved. Perhaps I may emphasise the point that we have been assured by Deloitte, Haskins and Sells that it and its clinical advisers will be actively seeking the views of local interests, including clinicians.

The hon. Member will understand that, until that study has been carried out and I have had the opportunity to consider it, it would be inappropriate for me to encourage speculation about whether such a unit will be set up, or where.

Turning from the review report and our response to it, I shall refer to the service currently provided by the English health authorities. As I have already mentioned, officials have met their counterparts in north Wales health authorities and neighbouring English regional health authorities to explore arrangements for more effective liaison on regional service issues. A clinical director has recently been appointed by Mersey regional health authority in respect of the regional radiotherapy service and the director has already been involved in discussions with officers of north Wales health authorities and Welsh Office officials regarding the development of radiotherapy services at Clatterbridge hospital. I understand that he has committed himself to improving the service that his hospital offers to Welsh patients—as to others—and I welcome that. Additionally, the West Midlands regional health authority is intending to mount a review of cancer treatment services and officials have sought to ensure that the interests of north Wales patients are fully considered there too.

In conclusion, I can assure the House that the commitment to cancer services for patients in north Wales to which I have referred in my speech will be sustained. I look forward to the results of the Deloitte report: it will be given the most careful consideration in consultation with interested parties in North Wales and England. I believe that the Department has forged a strong relationship with north Wales authorities on this issue and that it will bear fruit in the improved service for patients, for which the hon. Gentleman has called.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute past Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 11 July 1988

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Life Sentences)

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners presently serving life sentences have been in prison (a) over 20 years, (b) over 25 years and (c) over 30 years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The latest available information is given in the table:

Life sentence prisoners held under their original sentence[1] in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales on 31 March 1988: by time spent under sentence in such establishments

Years spent under sentence[2]	Number of prisoners[3]
Up to 20 years	2,354
Over 20 up to 25 years	30
Over 25 up to 30 years	6
Over 30 years	3
Total	2,393

[1] Excluding 84 prisoners recalled following an earlier release on licence.

[2] Excluding any time spent on remand in custody or in non-Prison Department establishments.

[3] The figures are those recorded centrally and are approximate: detailed checking of individual cases would involve disproportionate cost.

Television

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in his consideration of proposals for a fifth or sixth terrestrial television channel, it is envisaged that such channels should be capable of being transmitted to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland.

Mr. Renton: It may be technically feasible for additional television services to be provided on UHF in these areas, subject to more detailed assessment of the implications for other broadcasting and non-broadcasting services. Decisions on whether additional television services should be authorised, and, if so, under what conditions, have yet to be taken, and the Government's proposals on this will be included in a White Paper in due course.

Risley Remand Centre

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department's circular instruction 3/1987 is currently being implemented at Risley remand centre; who is responsible for ensuring that this instruction is followed at Risley remand centre and who was responsible for implementing this instruction at Risley remand centre during 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Circular instruction 3/1987 on suicide prevention is now being implemented at Risley remand centre. Responsibility for ensuring that circular instructions are implemented in an establishment lies with the governor.

Suspects (Naming)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to prevent reports in the media publishing names of individuals held by the police before they have been charged with any offence.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to do so. Disclosure by the police is already prohibited by standing orders.

Aliens (New College, Cardiff)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many aliens are registered as students at New college, Cardiff; and how their educational progress and attendance is monitored.

Mr. Renton: Applications for overseas nationals for leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom as students are considered on an individual basis and normally no record is maintained by the Home Office of the numbers of overseas students at individual educational establishments.

When a student applies for further leave to remain to continue studies, an attendance check may be made. In many cases a student's educational progress is evident from the courses being followed, but where there is cause to doubt a student's progress he may be asked for evidence of examination results.

Armley Prison

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convicted prisoners at Her Majesty's prison Armley, in Leeds, have been transferred to training establishments in each of the past 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information is as follows:

	YPs	Adults	Total

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many remand prisoners have been sent to Her Majesty's prison Armley, in Leeds, for each of the past 12 months.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The readily available information is given in the table:

Prisoners[1] initially received on remand into Leeds prison: by type of initial remand and month of reception, 1 June 1987–31 May 1988

	Type of initial remand

[1] The figures, which are provisional, are those recorded centrally and are approximate.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many remand prisoners have been transferred from Her Majesty's prison Armley, in Leeds, for each of the past 12 months.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Such information is not separately recorded and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to meet prison officers at Her Majesty's prison Armley, in Leeds, to discuss the problem of overcrowding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so. He visited the establishment in May last year and had wide-ranging discussions with management and staff.

Abortion (Carlisle)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to whether police interviewed during the course of their inquiry into the death of the Carlisle baby (a) the doctors who signed the abortion certificate, (b) the doctors who diagnosed Ehlers Danlos syndrome, (c) the consultant involved, (d) the registrar involved, (e) each nurse involved, (f) the senior houseman involved, and (g) the hospital chaplians; and if each person interviewed made a written statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The conduct of this investigation was an operational matter for which the chief constable of Cumbria had full responsibility. Disclosure of information about it is not a matter for the Home Department.

PRIME MINISTER

South Africa

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister what support Her Majesty's Government are giving to moderate black leaders in South Africa in their opposition to apartheid.

The Prime Minister: Our policy is to encourage all those who are working for a peaceful, negotiated end to apartheid. To this end, we maintain contact with a wide cross-section of South African opinion. We also provide practical assistance to black South Africans through our substantial aid programme.

Iranian Airliner

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what information she had about the route of the Iranian Airbus when she made a statement about its shooting down.

The Prime Minister: We were in touch with the United States throughout 3 July and took full account of the information available at the time and of the statements of President Reagan and the chairman of the American joint chiefs of staff.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will publish in the Official Report the text of the Government's statement on the shooting down of the Iranian airliner by the United States navy.

The Prime Minister: The statement of 3 July is as follows:

"The British Government profoundly regret the loss of life on the Iranian airliner and extend their deep sympathy to the bereaved. This has been a tragedy for all concerned.

We have been in touch with the United States and they have kept us informed of their investigations.

We understand that, in the course of an engagement following an Iranian attack on US forces, warnings were given to an unidentified aircraft apparently closing with a US warship, but these warnings received no response. We fully accept the right of forces engaged in such hostilities to defend themselves.

This tragic accident underlines the urgent need for an early end to the Iran/Iraq conflict including an end to all attacks on shipping."

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what information was passed to Her Majesty's Government, from British naval vessels operating in the straits of Hormuz, concerning the flight path and altitude of the Iranian Airbus at the time it was shot down.

The Prime Minister: There were no Royal Navy ships in the immediate vicinity and they have no direct information as to the Iranian Airbus's flight path.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what contact Her Majesty's Government have had with the United States Government concerning the information received by the USS Vincennes before the Iranian airbus was shot down in order to ensure that similar errors cannot be made by Her Majesty's ships operating in the area.

The Prime Minister: We remain in close touch with the United States and await the results of the naval investigation which they have set in hand. We shall consider carefully whether there are any lessons to be learnt with regard to the operations of the Armilla patrol.

Iran-Iraq War

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will make it her policy to dissociate the United Kingdom from the consequences of United States intervention in the war between Iran and Iraq.

The Prime Minister: The United States Government have stated that their policy towards the Iran-Iraq conflict is impartial. The tragic accident in which an Iranian Airbus was brought down on 3 July in no way constitutes intervention in the conflict.

British policy towards the conflict remains impartial. We are working in the United Nations to bring about a negotiated settlement based on UNSC resolution 598, and in the Gulf itself, to help uphold the principle of freedom of navigation.

Aircraft Identification

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if she is satisfied that officers of the Royal Navy are trained to be capable of distinguishing in all circumstances between a large civil aircraft approaching at less than average speed on a scheduled flight, and a fighter aircraft making an attacking run.

The Prime Minister: Royal Navy personnel are fully trained to do any tasks that are likely to be required of them.

US Rules of Engagement (Persian Gulf)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government were consulted by the United States Government before they relaxed their rules of engagement for the United States naval vessels operating in the Persian Gulf; and what representations she made to President Reagan concerning the likely outcome of this change.

The Prime Minister: National rules of engagement are a matter for the countries concerned.

Charities (VAT)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what representations she has had from Oxfam in regard to tax threats to charities and, in particular, the effect of the Local Government Finance Bill and the proposal to levy value added tax on the sale of donated goods by charities; what reply she is sending; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I received two letters from Mr. Frank Judd, director of Oxfam, dated 17 and 29 June, to which I replied on 8 July.

Civil Servants

Mr. John: To ask the Prime Minister to what extent the maintenance of political neutrality by civil servants is a matter of internal management by each Department; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The maintenance of political impartiality by civil servants is the responsibility of Ministers, senior Civil Service management, and individual civil servants.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Birmingham Pub Bombings

66. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss progress on the further police inquiries into telephone calls made by Dr. Frank Skuse while giving evidence at the Birmingham pub bombings appeal.

71. Dr. Reid: To ask the Attorney-General when he last discussed with the Director of Public Prosecutions the progress of the further inquiries by the City of London police into telephone calls by Dr. Frank Skuse during his appearance as a witness at the Birmingham pub bombings appeal.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to the answer that I gave today to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin).

69. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Attorney-General if the Director of Public Prosecutions has yet received a report from the City of London police regarding their further inquiries into telephone calls made by Dr. Frank Skuse in relation to the Birmingham pub bombings case.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has received regular reports of the progress made in those inquiries.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

70. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Attorney-General when he next expects to meet the Director of Public Prosecutions to discuss the further police inquiry into telephone calls made by Dr. Frank Skuse during the Birmingham pub bombings appeal.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer that I gave today to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). I do not expect to discuss the matter with the Director again, unless evidence to substantiate the allegations against Dr. Skuse and others should emerge.

Sunday Trading

67. Mr. Cran: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer of 16 June, Official Report, column 201, when the expects the Association of District Councils to respond to his request for information regarding the enforcement of the Sunday trading provisions of the Shops Act 1950; and what other steps he is taking to ascertain the scale of such enforcement.

The Attorney-General: My Department was informed by the association in mid-June that the association hoped to write to me

"within the next few days".

It has no doubt taken longer than expected to collate the results of the association's survey of its member authorities. I expect that survey to provide the most authoritative information on the scale of the enforcement effort since the association can call upon the resources of all the local authorities concerned.

Director of Public Prosecutions

68. Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General when he last met the Director of Public Prosecutions; and what matters were discussed.

The Attorney-General: I last met the Director of Public Prosecutions on Friday, 8 July 1988. We discussed the outcome of the investigation by the City of London police into allegations made against Dr. Frank Skuse and others by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and other matters relating to the Crown Prosecution Service.

Irish Republic (Extradition)

72. Sir John Biggs-Davison: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a further statement about the implementation of extradition from the Irish Republic.

The Attorney-General: Section 6 of the Irish Extradition (Amendment) Act 1987 provides that the Irish Government shall, as soon as may be after the first day of January in each year beginning with the year 1989, make a report to each House of the Oireachtas on the operation in the preceding year of part III of the Extradition Act 1965. The Irish Minister of Justice has stated that it has been the Irish Government's intention from the start that the review would identify any shortcomings that may exist, and he has reaffirmed the Irish Government's commitment to introduce amending legislation, should that prove necessary. This commitment was stated to extend to all aspects of the extradition arrangements with the United Kingdom.

The Government will continue to address these matters with the Irish Government in the context of that Government's review. For my part I have corresponded with, and spoken to, the Irish Attorney-General on a number of occasions since the McVeigh decision, with a view to securing the important mutual objective of enabling extradition between our two countries to proceed effectively. In addition, Mr. Murray and I have agreed to meet in the near future for further discussion of these matters.

Gloucester United Schools' Charity

73. Mr. French: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has received about the administration of the Gloucester United Schools' Charity.

The Attorney-General: I have received written representations from my hon. Friend to which I hope to be in a position to reply as soon as possible.

Government Employees (Security)

74. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Attorney-General when he last reviewed prosecution policy in relation to breaches of security by Government employees; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Prosecution policy in relation to all criminal offences is kept under review by the Director of Public Prosecutions and his senior staff. I reviewed the policy in relation to alleged breaches of security by Government employees in November 1987.

Family Courts

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General when the Lord Chancellor plans to reply to the responses to his consultative document on the introduction of a family court.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor hopes to make an announcement about a family court by the autumn, after having considered the recommendations of the report of the inquiry into child abuse in Cleveland.

Children and Young Persons Act 1986

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will now bring section 2 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1986 into force.

The Attorney-General : Yes. The Lord Chancellor intends to bring both section 2 and section 3 of this Act into force on 1 August 1988.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Nicaragua

78. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, following the signing of the Esquipulas peace accord by the Central American nations, he will now urgently consider a substantial rise in bilateral aid to Nicaragua.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have no plans to do so.

Sri Lanka

80. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Sri Lankan Government as to future aid projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My most recent discussions with the Sri Lankan Government took place during my visit in March of this year, when I signed an agreement for the provision of £20 million in reconstruction aid. Last month I met the Sri Lankan Minister of Transport in London to discuss our assistanee to the transport sector.

94. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a further statement on British aid to Sri Lanka.

Mr. Chris Patten: I recently signed an agreement to provide £20 million in reconstruction aid to Sri Lanka. Our programme also includes funding for new projects for the rehabilitation of roads and power facilities in Colombo, and a substantial technical co-operation programme.

Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation

81. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation has made in engendering economic and social development in developing Commonwealth countries since its establishment.

Mr. Chris Patten: At their meeting in Vancouver last November Commonwealth Heads of Government expressed their appreciation of the effective way in which the fund was meeting urgent needs for expertise and training in a wide variety of fields.

Aid Donors (OECD)

82. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to which Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries' aid budget as a proportion of gross national product exceeds 0·28 per cent.

Mr. Chris Patten: In 1987, member countries of the OECD's development assistance committee whose net official development assistance as a proportion of gross national product exceeded 0·28 per cent. were: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland.

Kampuchea

84. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of Vietnam's undertaking of 25 May to withdraw half its troops from Kampuchea by the end of the year, he has arranged a meeting with representatives of the Phnom Penh Government to discuss the resumption of United Kingdom aid to Kampuchea.

Mr. Chris Patten: No.

Aid (Priorities)

85. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's current priorities for granting aid assistance.

Mr. Chris Patten: Our policy on the allocation of bilateral aid to developing countries is set out in Command Paper 225, "Bilateral Aid: Country Programmes", published in October 1987. As this explains, the fundamental objective of the aid programme is to promote sustainable economic and social progress and alleviate poverty in developing countries. Priorities are decided accordingly.

Afghanistan

86. Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a further statement on British aid to Afghanistan.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am sufficiently encouraged by progress on the co-ordination of arrangements for resettlement to allocate the £10 million which was pledged for Afghan refugees earlier this year. Our assistance will be channelled through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Committee for the Red Cross, UNICEF and British voluntary agencies including Afghanaid as follows:

	£ million
United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees	6·75
International Committee for the Red Cross	1·50
UNICEF	0·25
British voluntary agencies	1·50

Our early release of funds will enable these agencies to take action before the onset of bad weather restricts operations.

UNESCO

87. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what would be the cost of United Kingdom membership of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation in the current financial year; and how much of this money has been reallocated to aid projects since the United Kingdom left the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

Mr. Chris Patten: The cost would depend on the terms on which we rejoined the organisation. In 1985, the last year of our membership, it was £6·4 million. This amount has all been reallocated to educational, scientific and cultural programmes.

Ethiopia

88. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contribution Her Majesty's Government are making to the international relief effort in Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Since the beginning of 1987 we have committed more than £45 million of assistance in support of the international relief effort in Ethiopia. This figure includes the cost of some 95,000 tonnes of bilateral food aid, donations totalling £3 million towards the cost of the United Nations airlift operation and our share of the cost of European Community food and emergency assistance. We stand ready to contribute further to the relief effort as the situation develops.

Export Diversification

89. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his Department has been doing to encourage export diversification in the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: Many ACP states are adopting internationally agreed structural adjustment programmes which provide for improved incentives for exports, both traditional and new. We are supporting such programmes with our bilateral aid and our contributions through the International Development Association, the regional development banks and the European development fund. We support the Community's aid for export promotion by ACP and other development countries, and we fund our own agency in Britain (the Developing Countries Trade Agency) to do similar work directly.

Tanzania

90. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance Her Majesty's Government are giving to Tanzania's economic development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last month announced a further £10 million in support of Tanzania's economic recovery programme. This brings to over £80 million the new aid pledged since Tanzania reached agreement with the International Monetary Fund in August 1986.

European Community Aid

91. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to enhance the effectiveness of European Community aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I attach great importance to working with our EC partners and the EC Commission to achieve this. Notable advances have already been made, not least the reform of Community food aid during our presidency in 1986. But there is scope for further improvement. In particular, the Lomé convention is about to be renegotiated. When I spoke to the Royal Commonwealth Society on 3 May, I outlined ways in which I feel the trade and aid provisions of the Lomé relationship could be made more effective. A copy of my speech has been placed in the Library of the House.

Agricultural Diversification

92. Sir Michael Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his Department has been doing to encourage agricultural diversification in the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the Pacific, we are helping the islands diversify away from coconuts, for example, in Vanuatu, with the Commonwealth Development Corporation, by supporting cocoa and coffee projects and livestock and forestry programmes; in the Solomon Islands by supporting forestry and spice development; and in the smaller atoll islands by providing expertise to increase self-sufficiency in meat and vegetables.

In the Caribbean, we are supporting a range of activities to help countries diversify away from sugar and bananas into other tropical fruit, coffee, spices and annual food crops, for example, yams.

Agricultural diversification is less important in Africa than in the Caribbean and Pacific as there are fewer countries dependent on single export crops. Our assistance focuses on developing food crops, agro-industries and commodity exports.

Immunisation

93. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress on the United Nations international children's emergency fund global immunisation programme to eradicate the six preventable diseases, and the United Kingdom contribution thereto.

Mr. Chris Patten: The amount committed to immunisation projects had risen at 4 March—the latest date for which figures are available—to $215 million. The United Kingdom has contributed a further £4·43 million to five UNICEF country projects which include immunisation and mother and child health care.

Poorest Nations

95. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department is taking to assist in the improvement of the economic infrastructure of the world's poorest countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the allocation of our bilateral aid resources, most of which go to the poorest countries, we fully recognise the importance of efficient infrastructure. For example, we are involved currently in support for the power, coal and railway sectors in India, roads in Malawi, Kenya and Tanzania, water in Ghana and power generation in the Sudan. The substantial funds we provide through multilateral institutions, particularly the International Development Association, the regional development banks and the European Development Fund are used extensively to improve the economic infrastructure of the poorest countries.

Renewable Natural Resources

96. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what expenditure was allocated in 1987 to renewable natural resources projects; and what was the nature of the projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: In 1987 financial aid expenditure on renewable natural resources projects totalled £61·6 million. Of this, 61 per cent. was allocated to agriculture and livestock, 20 per cent. to land development and irrigation, 12 per cent. to forestry and the remainder to a range of subject areas, including fisheries and rural development. In addition, some £12·4 million was spent on research and development. There was additional expenditure under technical co-operation programmes which it would be disproportionately expensive to collate.

Lomé Convention

97. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much aid in total under the third Lomé convention has been allocated so far by the European Community; and what proportion of this amount the United Kingdom's share represents.

Mr. Chris Patten: At 31 March 1988, total commitments under the third Lomé convention were 2·6 billion ecu, about £1·74 billion. The United Kingdom share of this amount is £288 million.

Aid Donors

98. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the average percentage of gross national product given in aid in 1987 by donor nations, excluding the United Kingdom which are members of (a) the Group of Seven leading industrialised nations, (b) the European Community and (c) the development assistance committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Chris Patten: In 1987 net aid as a percentage of GNP, excluding the United Kingdom, averaged 0·32 per cent. for the Group of Seven; 0·5 per cent. for those members of the European Community for which the Development Assistance Committee has published figures; and 0·34 per cent. for all development assistance committee members.

Developing Commonwealth Countries

99. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much bilateral aid has been allocated for this financial year to developing Commonwealth countries.

Mr. Chris Patten: Provision for developing Commonwealth countries from the country programmes and budgetary aid sub-heads of the Supply Estimates 1988-89 amounts to £339,705,000.

Commonwealth Youth Programme

100. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current level of the United Kingdom's contribution to the Commonwealth youth programme; and what were the comparable figures in earlier years.

Mr. Chris Patten: Over the past three financial years the figures are:

1987-88	306,000
1986-87	290,000
1985-86	360,000

These amounts represent 30 per cent. of the programme's actual expenditure each year.

Voluntary Agencies

101. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the proportion of the total income of non-governmental organisations provided through Government grants in the most recent years for which figures are available; and what is this proportion for each of Oxfam, Save the Children Fund, Catholic Fund for Overseas Development and Christian Aid.

Mr. Chris Patten: My Department does not hold figures centrally on the total income of the non-governmental organisations involved in overseas aid and development. By no means all of these organisations seek assistance from my Department and many are not solely engaged in work in developing countries but also engage in field work in the United Kingdom.

The proportion of total income provided through grants of all kinds from my Department to the four charities named for the 1986-87 financial year, the latest for which figures are available, are:

	Per cent
Catholic Fund for Overseas Development	[1]13·0
Christian Aid	8·4
Oxfam	9·4

[1] approximate.

102. Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will increase his Department's support for the overseas aid activities of Britain's voluntary agencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Decisions on spending under the aid programme for the next financial year have yet to be made. However, this year's budget for the joint funding scheme now stands at £10·5 million which is a 75 per cent. increase on the original allocation for last year. I hope to be able to continue to provide substantial support through the joint funding scheme for the work of British voluntary agencies in the future.

AIDS

103. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress his Department is making in conjunction with international agencies with their action to contain the spread of the AIDS pandemic.

Mr. Chris Patten: International co-operation in efforts to combat AIDS is essential. The World Health Organisation (WHO) is leading the international effort. It has developed a global strategy, and over 75 plans for national AIDS control programmes are now being implemented with WHO assistance. Her Majesty's Government have committed over £12 million so far in direct support of this work. £4·6 million of this is in the form of contributions to WHO-backed national programmes in four African countries. In addition we have provided a grant of £1·6 million over three years to support the work of the International Planned Parenthood Federation which is helping family planning associations overseas to introduce information and counselling services on AIDS. Other international aid agencies to which we contribute in support of their general operations have programmes under way in collaboration with the WHO aimed at containing the spread of HIV. In the case of the European Community, the United Kingdom share of their aid commitments to combat AIDS is about £4·2 million.

Her Majesty's Government take every opportunity to encourage open debate and exchange of information about the AIDS problem and have co-sponsored resolutions on AIDS at world health assemblies and at the United Nations General Assembly. The United Kingdom has played an active role in discussions of the problem in the European Community, the Commonwealth and the Council of Europe and has supported the establishment of a mechanism for Communitywide information exchange.

The Government organised jointly with the WHO a world summit of Ministers of Health on programmes for AIDS prevention in London in January. The 148 countries represented adopted unanimously a declaration which stressed the importance of information and education in national AIDS control programmes.

Third World (Aid)

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the United Nations' current target figure of gross national product to be allocated to Third world aid; and what percentage of gross national product the United Kingdom's contributions represent.

Mr. Chris Patten: The UN target for official development assistance (ODA) as a proportion of gross national product (GNP) is 0·7 per cent. In 1987 Britain's net ODA represented 0·28 per cent. of GNP. The aid programme is now growing in real terms. In the current financial year we plan to spend about £1,307 million, some £97 million more than the likely outturn for last year. The programme is planned to rise by some £70 million in 1989-90 and by a further £45 million in 1990-91.

Somalia

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit Somalia to discuss the provision of food aid.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have no such plans at present. While Somalia has some requirement for food aid, there are more acute needs elsewhere in Africa and I believe that these should be given priority in the allocation of our food aid.

THE ARTS

Libraries

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received from bodies, including community councils, about the implications of the Green Paper, "Financing our Public Library Service"; and what consideration he is giving to the concerns expressed.

Mr. Luce: I have received about 5,300 responses so far, including many from library authorities and other local organisations. The task of categorising, analysing, and considering the responses will begin shortly.

Items in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will specify the allocations made to public institutions in the United Kingdom during the half-year ended 30 June of individual works of art and museum objects pre-eminent for national scientific, historic or artistic interest have been accepted in satisfaction of inheritance tax or capital transfer tax, together with information where applicable as to conditions or wishes expressed by testators or executors in the matter of allocation; whether he will list the works of art or museum objects which are still awaiting allocation, with the respective date of their acceptance in satisfaction of inheritance tax or capital transfer tax; and whether the customary press notice will be issued from the Office of Arts and Libraries covering the information given in his reply.

Mr. Luce: The information is as follows:

Items allocated since 1 January 1988

A press notice is being issued.

THE ARTS

British Library

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he intends to put the drawings of the new British Library on public display; and what steps he has taken to ensure that there has been adequate opportunity for consultation as to the architectural merits of the scheme.

Mr. Richard Luce [holding answer 7 July 1988]: Camden council gave planning permission for the building in June 1978 after architectural plans had been lodged with it since December 1975, and a model of the proposed building had been exhibited in Camden town hall in 1977. The Royal Fine Art Commission gave its approval to the project in January 1978 and made the comment "a brilliant solution to an extremely complex problem". An artist's drawing of the exterior of the new building will shortly be displayed in the entrance hall of the science reference section in Southampton building, Chancery lane. Later this year it will be shown in the British Library galleries at the British museum building, together with a new model of the building. A copy of the artist's drawing showing the exterior of the new building will also be displayed on the Euston road hoarding in front of the new building. Information leaflets due to be published this autumn will show recent progress photographs of the new building and of the artist's impressions of the finished building.

The Property Services Agency, which is managing construction of the project, is proposing to erect a public viewing platform at the south-west corner of the site during the autumn.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Debtor Nations

104. Sir David Price: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's progress in implementing the debt initiative for the most debt-ridden countries put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, following the recent Group of Seven meeting in Toronto.

106. Mr. Franks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further measures are being taken to ease the situation of Third world indebtedness in the light of the Toronto economic summit and the discussions there relating to the debts of the lesser-developed nations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: The Toronto summit agreed that very poor, heavily indebted countries which are following approved adjustment programmes, should be offered debt relief. Official creditors will choose between offering concessional interest rates, longer repayment periods, partial write-off or a combination of these options. The Paris Club has been asked to work out the technicalities by the end of the year. Its first meeting began today.

105. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what initiative Her Majesty's Government are taking along with other nations to resolve the debt problem as it affects Latin American debtor nations.

Mr. Lilley: Countries meeting at the Toronto economic summit agreed that the problems of the middle income debtor countries, the majority of which are in Latin America, should continue to be tackled by the growth-led, market-oriented strategy based on the case by case approach. They endorsed recent initiatives at the IMF to provide increased support to medium-term structural adjustment by the middle income debtor countries and the general capital increase at the World Bank. They also supported the increasing use of the "menu" approach in agreements reached with the commercial banks.

Productivity

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in the productivity of the whole United Kingdom economy since 1980.

Mr. Major: Since 1980 output per head in the whole economy has grown at an average rate of $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. per year, about the same as Japan and faster than any other major industrialised country.

Consumer Credit

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had on the availability of consumer credit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has received a number of such representations.

Public Corporations

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the end of each year from 1979 to 1986 the totals for the public corporations which were at the end of 1986 classified as still being within the public sector for (a) tangible assets, (b) financial assets and (c) financial liabilities, as shown in table 11.6 of the "United Kingdom National Accounts" 1987 edition, breaking down the figures for financial assets and liabilities between (a) claims on or liabilities to central Government and (b) other claims or liabilities.

Mr. Major: The components of each series are not readily available broken down by individual corporation. It would therefore be disproportionately costly to identify totals for 1979 to 1985 covering those corporations still classified as being in the public sector in 1986.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Charities (Payroll-giving)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many hon. Members have taken up the offer by the Fees Office to arrange payroll-giving to a nominated charity; and how much total revenue will be provided for charities as a result.

Mr. Wakeham: Thirty-nine right hon. and hon. Members have so far availed themselves of the Fees Office facility for payroll giving to charities. The total amount of the gifts to charity from this source in 1988-89 is estimated as £5,220. Members who also hold ministerial office are known to be contributing through their departmental schemes; other Members may be giving through organsations from which they receive regular emoluments.

ENERGY

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those sites which he is considering as locations for new nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: None. but the Central Electricity Generating Board has submitted an application, under section 2 of the Electric Lighting Act 1909, seeking consent to construct a pressurised water reactor (PWR) at Hinkley Point.

Electricity Supply Industry

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the value of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on 23 November 1987. The accounts for the electricity supply industry for 1987-88 have not yet been published.

WALES

Waste Disposal

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will meet Llay community council, Wrexham Maelor borough council and Clwyd county council to discuss the impact upon the locality of the tipping of contaminated soils and other poisonous substances from abroad and from within the United Kingdom in the locality of Chapel lane and Dark lane, Rosseth, Clwyd; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will seek to ensure a permanent presence of the inspectorate at the tipping site near Dark lane and Chapel lane, Rosseth, Clwyd; if he will convene a meeting of members of the pollution inspectorate, local residents, the owners of the tipping site and local authority planning officers; and if he will make an official visit to the tipping site.

Mr. Grist: Responsibility for the supervision of these sites rests with Wrexham Maelor borough council as the waste disposal authority.

It is for the council to consider whether meetings with the local residents and their representatives are necessary and to seek any advice required from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit the sites.

Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will strengthen the inspectorate of pollution in Wales; and how many of the inspectorate are based in (a) Wales, (b) north Wales and (c) north-west England.

Mr. Grist: The staffing of the inspectorate is kept under continuous review. At present one controlled waste inspector based in Cardiff covers the whole of Wales. The question of cover for the north-west of England is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of times in 1987 and 1988 when the pollution inspectorate visited the Dark lane/Chapel lane tipping site at Rosseth up to and including 1 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Two visits were made during 1987 and there have been two during 1988 the more recent of which took place on 24 June. Additionally the sites have been subject to surveillance on a number of occasions.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will furnish local residents with full documentation instancing their rights concerning the tipping of contaminated soils and other dangerous substances in the Rosseth locality; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: It is the duty of Wrexham Maelor borough council, as waste disposal authority, to ensure that licensed waste disposal operations in its area do not cause pollution of water, danger to public health of become seriously detrimental to the amenities of the locality.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning his policy on the importation of contaminated soils and dangerous substances into Wales from abroad and from within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Grist: The Government believe that the provision of waste disposal services is a legitimate and proper element of domestic and international trade provided that adequate safeguards are in existence to ensure that there is no danger to public health or the environment.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish details of the ownerships of the tipping site near Chapel lane, Rosseth, Clwyd; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Responsibility for licensing these sites rests with the Wrexham Maelor borough council to which I would refer the hon. Gentleman for the information.

SCOTLAND

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report showing, for each year from 1979 until the latest year for which figures are available, the total number of children with special educational needs who (a) left education, (b) took further education or training, or (c) followed other careers, after the age of 16 years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. Available data are given in the tables. Table A shows the numbers of leavers from special schools/departments in Scotland for each session from 1978-79 to 1986-87. Information on the post-school destination of such leavers, which has only been collected since 1984-85, is presented in table B.

Table A

Year
1978-79	1,625
1979-80	1,585
1980-81	1,444
1981-82	1,303
1982-83	1,332
1983-84	1,378
1984-85	1,227
1985-86	1,187
1986-87	1,398

Table B

Destination	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
Open employment	58	78	103
MSC provision	188	177	255
Adult training centre	235	199	225
Further education centre	254	313	296
Other work or education	47	44	49
Neither in work nor education	210	162	205
Destination not known	235	214	265
All leavers	1,227	1,187	1,398

Notes:

(1) Data for 1986-87 include 215 leavers from independent special schools; the data for the earlier years cover education authority and grant-aided special schools only.

(2) A small but increasing number of children with special educational needs are taught in mainstream secondary schools. The numbers of leavers of this type are not known.

Wild Birds (Poisoned Bait)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has about the number of golden eagles killed by poisoned bait in Scotland over the past five years; and how many have been killed on Islay.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the period from 1 January 1983 to 30 June 1988 12 golden eagles are known to have been killed by poison in Scotland. Two of these were killed on Islay.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has about the number of wild birds killed by the use of poisoned bait in Scotland since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Comprehensive information on the numbers of wild birds killed in Scotland by poison is not available because precise numbers are not always recorded in the case of multiple deaths involving corvids, gulls and some passerine species. Between 1 January 1979 and 30 June 1988, 546 birds are known to have been killed by the use of poisoned bait.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has concerning the death of two sea eagles in Scotland caused by poisoning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is positive evidence of one sea eagle having been killed by the poison mevinphos in Caithness in April 1981. Another sea eagle found on Skye in November 1981 may have been killed by poison. By the time that the carcase was found it was almost completely decomposed and no analysis for pesticide residues could be undertaken.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many birds of prey have been reported poisoned each year over the past five years; and how many successful prosecutions for poisoning birds of prey there have been each year over the past five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Over the period from 1 January 1983 to 30 June 1988 the numbers of birds of prey reported as having been poisoned in Scotland were:

	Birds
1983	20
1984	8
1985	13
1986	[2]20
1987	11
[1]1988	12

[1] To 30 June.
[2] Including 6 herons.

No statistics of successful prosecutions by category of offence under the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 are available centrally.

Hooded Crows

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has about a hooded crow destruction scheme being carried out on Islay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Hooded crows are not a protected species. We have no first-hand information about action that may have been taken on Islay to control their numbers.

Scottish Health Service Planning Council

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the will make a statement about the future role of the Scottish Health Service Planning Council.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A consultation paper on the future of the Scottish Health Service Planning Council was issued in October 1987 and by the end of March 1988, 80 bodies had submitted replies. The responses are being analysed at present and consideration is being given to the recommendations. A statement will be made in due course.

Women's Refuges

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of places per 10,000 women at women's refuges in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not available centrally on the total number of refuges or the number of places provided.

Coastal Waters (Pollution)

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies he is undertaking or commissioning into the effects of pollution in the Scottish coastal waters; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 28 June 1988]: The Scottish Office is currently funding research, undertaken by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, into the effects of contaminants in waste deposited at sea, the incidence of fish diseases from dumping operations and the possible effects of mariculture on the environment resulting from the addition of nutrients and specific chemicals to water.

Research on local marine pollution matters is normally carried out by the river purification boards which are statutorily responsible for promoting the cleanliness of coastal waters in Scotland.

Smoke Detectors

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider amending building regulations to provide for the mandatory installation of smoke detectors in all new domestic homes and in properties that are renovated and improved; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 6 July 1988]: I recently sought the advice of the building standards advisory committee on this question. The committee drew attention to a number of technical problems which must be resolved for effective regulation to be possible and I have asked for these to be examined as quickly as possible within the context of the current review of the fire-related regulations north and south of the border.

Afforestation

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will issue advice to the Forestry Commission to assist it in implementing the Environmental Assessment (Afforestation) Regulations 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 6 July 1988]: My right hon. and learned Friend will issue advice to the commission, if necessary, in the light of experience gained in the implementation of the regulations.

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of his departmental budget he intends to spend on advertising in the current year and 1989; and what sums will be spent on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) pamphlets.

Mr. Rifkind: Planned expenditure by my Department on information campaigns, including advertising, in 1988-89 will be approximately 0·03 per cent. of total expenditure shown in the class XVI Scotland Supply Estimates 1988-89. Since the form of the campaigns has not yet been settled, it is not possible to give the breakdown requested.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students (Finance)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library the terms of reference of his Department's review of student finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The terms of reference of the student support review are:

To review the present arrangements for the financial support of students studying at first degree level or equivalent in Great Britain and to consider the future basis for such support, having regard to:

i. the situation and the maintenance needs of students, and the extent to which it is appropriate that those needs should be supported from public funds;

ii. other actual and possible sources of support which would allow the removal of students from the social security system—including the case for a system involving loans as well as grants, and the contribution of sponsorship to the needs of students on vocationally oriented courses;

iii. the Government's stated policies for higher education and access to it; and

iv. arrangements made in other countries with developed systems for the financial support of students.

Education Reform

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what number of persons was proposed for membership of each of the national curriculum working groups on mathematics, science and English by educational organisations of professional bodies; if he will describe which educational organisations or professional bodies proposed persons for membership; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what number of persons was considered for potential appointment to each of the national curriculum working groups on mathematics, science and English;

(3) if he will publish a table, showing for each of the national curriculum working groups on mathematics, science and English, the number of members appointed who had been proposed for membership by (a) an educational organisation or professional body, (b) a trade union and (c) any other organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Members were appointed to the national curriculum working groups on mathematics, science and English as individuals, for their personal expertise and experience, not as representatives of particular educational organisations and professional bodies. My right hon. Friend considered persons reflecting a wide range of interests and expertise, whose names were suggested by a variety of educational and other relevant organisations. The appointments to these three working groups were made from a shortlist of over 200 such persons.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Yeovil of 27 June, Official Report, column 7, whether discussions with members or potential members of the English working group were held before or after appointment was offered to the person concerned; what number of persons with whom such discussions were held were not offered appointment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Discussions were held with potential members of the English working group before appointments were offered. It would not be appropriate to comment further on cases where appointment may not have been offered following discussion.

Information (Leak)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to be in a position to decide whether any action is necessary in the light of the inquiry into the unauthorised leak of information and briefing in relation to correspondence between the Private Secretary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Paul Gray, and Mr. Tom Jeffrey of his Department.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend will take whatever action is considered necessary.

University Technicians (Pay)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is now his intention to make any additional funding available to meet the cost of implementation of the comparative standing of university technicians' pay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: It is for universities to manage their own affairs within the total resources at their disposal. The amount available for the public funding of universities is about to be reviewed in the annual public expenditure survey.

Free School Meals

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list, by local education authorities, the total number of free school meals served (a) January to March inclusive and (b) April to June inclusive.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is not available. Data on the number of free school meals are collected annually by means of a census taken in October which is published in March the following year. Data for 1987, the latest date for which they are available, are in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farm Woodland Scheme

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications have so far been received under the farm woodland scheme; and what acreage is covered by such applications.

Mr. Gummer: None. This scheme does not come into effect until 1 October 1988.

Cereals

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current level of wheat in store in the United Kingdom; and what is the anticipated level after the 1988 harvest.

Mr. Donald Thompson: On 1 July 830,000 tonnes of wheat were held in intervention stores in the United Kingdom. At this stage it is not possible to predict the outcome of the 1988 harvest level of cereal intervention stocks in the 1988-89 marketing year.

Beef

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement explaining the origin of the clauses relating to intervention for beef under which some member states maintained a buying in price 2·5 per cent. above the market price; whether this procedure was followed in the United Kingdom, and what has been the effect on this procedure of the recent farm price review.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The buying-in price for any category or quality of beef fixed by the Commission is the same in all member states in which intervention in that category and quality of beef is open. Prices are fixed in European currency units on the basis of rules agreed by the Council of Agriculture Ministers in December 1986 as part of the package of measures to reform the support regime for beef.

These rules provide for the calculation of buying-in prices on the basis of a weighted average of the market prices prevailing in those member states for which intervention is open, excluding prices above the intervention trigger-point. However, in the discussions which led to the December 1986 agreement, concern was expressed that in gearing intervention prices to market prices at a time when market prices were expected to be weak in the face of cuts in milk quotas, the system might encourage a downward spiral of prices. Two safeguards were therefore introduced. The first of these is a flat-rate additon of 8·6 ecus/100g (£61·11 tonne), equivalent to 2·5 per cent. of the institutional intervention price for beef of R3 quality. The second provides that if the weighted average plus the flat-rate addition is less than any of the market prices which have been taken into account in calculating the average, the highest of those prices shall be the buying-in price applied.

Modifications to the system of calculating buying-in prices were established on the basis of a consensus reached at the Council of Agriculture Ministers at its meeting in Luxembourg on 13-17 June. In the absence of the adoption of the 1988-89 price-fixing regulations by the Council, the Commission, acting under its own powers, has adopted a measure on these lines which allows it to suspend or restrict the application of one or both of the two safeguards in certain market conditions. The exact effect of this measure depends on the level of market prices, as compared with the institutional intervention prices set. For the week beginning 11 July, the new rules have resulted in buying-in prices being fixed about 3 per cent. lower than they would have been under the unmodified system.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by what percentage the proposed expenditure on the common agricultural policy, excluding fisheries, in the 1989 preliminary draft budget exceeds the actual outturn of spending in this area in 1987.

Mr. MacGregor: Expenditure proposed for agriculture in the 1989 preliminary draft budget, excluding exceptional items, is 5 per cent. greater than the underlying level of expenditure for the calendar year 1987.

(mecu)	1987 underlying expenditure[1]	1989 PDB
Market support	27,482	[2]28,235
Structural and other measures	895	1,547
	28,377	[3]29,782 (+5[4])

[2] Covers expenditure from 16.10.88 to 15.10.89.
[3] In addition the 1989 PDB contains 640 mecu for depreciation of old stocks, 800 mecu for reimbursement of butter disposals in 1987-88, and a monetary reserve of 1,000 mecu.
[4] Percent.

New Zealand (Butter Exports)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if in the light of the Prime Minister's comments in the House on 19 May, Official Report, column 1087-8, in regard to New Zealand's butter exports to the United Kingdom, he will make a statement on the steps he is taking to encourage the European Commission to put forward proposals that are likely to be acceptable to New Zealand.

Mr. MacGregor: I will ensure that the Government's views on this issue are communicated to the European Commission at the appropriate time.

Monomorium Pharaonis

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures have been adopted by his Department to limit the spread of monomorium pharaonis.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 8 July 1988]: None, but chargeable advice on the measures available to control this ant can be obtained from the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service's Slough laboratory.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when and by what means monomorium pharaonis was introduced into the United Kingdom; and what information he has about its current distribution and habitat.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 8 July 1988]: The Pharaoh's ant (monomorium pharaonis) was first recorded in Britain in 1828, possibly as a result of accidental introduction on cargoes from tropical regions where the ant is endemic. It is now widely distributed throughout the United Kingdom although infestations are confined to permanently heated premises such as hospitals, bakers and large domestic apartment buildings. Nests are usually located in wall cavities, foundations and underground service ducting.

Quangos and Trading Funds

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all quasi-autonomous non-Government organisations and trading funds reporting to his Department.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Details of all public bodies for which my Department has responsibility are given in "Public Bodies 1987" produced by the Cabinet Office (OMCS), except in the case of the dairy produce quota tribunal for England and Wales which will be included in the 1988 edition.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Electronics Industry

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many licences have been issued to foreign electrical companies in the last five years allowing them to set up operations in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: Licences are not required to set up operations in the United Kingdom. The total number of investment projects known to the Invest in Britain Bureau set up in the United Kingdom by overseas "electrical" companies for the years 1984 to 1987 is 359 (112 projects in the office machinery and data processing equipment industries and 247 projects in the electrical and electronic engineering industries). Data for the years prior to 1984 are not available.

Single European Market

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met his counterparts from the other European Community states to discuss the effects of the completion of the single European market on the economy of the less-favoured regions of the Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: Other Ministers and I frequently meet our counterparts in other member states to discuss all aspects of the completion of the single market.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the current progress of preparations by British industry for 1992.

Mr. Maude: Business awareness of the 1992 target date has risen dramatically since we launched our Europe open for busines campaign and is now about 80 per cent. The next phase of the campaign will underline the need for action by firms throughout the country to prepare for the challenge of operating in the single market. Only about a quarter are yet doing so.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received concerning the effects of the completion of the European single market on the regions of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: I have recently answered questions on this issue from several hon. Members, incuding the hon. Members for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) and for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) on 13 April at column 159 and 7 June at column 430, respectively.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what attempts he made to find a manufacturer wholly or mainly engaged in production in the United Kingdom to take part in his advertising campaign to promote 1992.

Mr. Maude: Several of the business figures featured in the single European market advertising campaign are associated with manufacturing in the United Kingdom, including Sir John Egan, the chairman and chief executive of Jaguar.

Cement

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of the total United Kingdom cement market was supplied by imports from Greece in 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: The volume of cement imports from Greece in 1987 was 176,661 tonnes. No information is available on the size of the United Kingdom cement market in 1987, but in 1986 it was 13 million tonnes.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish in the Official Report the evidence submitted by his Department to the European Commission, on the subject of the Commission's inquiry into support given by the Greek Government to Heracles General Cement Company.

Mr. Alan Clark: Observations submitted by Her Majesty's Government to the Commission form part of confidential exchanges between member states and the Commission in the course of its investigation.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has on the level of subsidy paid by the Greek Government on imports of cement to the United Kingdom since 1 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I do not have comprehensive information on the extent of subsidies paid by the Greek Government to Greek cement producers which may have an influence on their exports to the United Kingdom. While export subsidies were planned to decline sharply between 1986 and 1988, other aids to Greek cement producers are being investigated by the European Commission.

Post Office

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he will place in the Library copies of all bilateral and multilateral agreements and related documents concerning the new terminal dues agreements signed by the Post Office and foreign postal administrations;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the dates of effectiveness of all bilateral agreements signed in the last two years relating to increased terminal dues;

(3) when he last discussed the new terminal dues agreements with the international bureau of the Universal Postal Union; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what action he has taken under article 116 of the general regulations of the Universal Postal Union relating to terminal dues since 1987;

(5) what information he has on the effect of the new terminal dues agreements signed by the Post Office;

(6) what assessment he has made of the implications of the treaty of Rome for the operation of article 23 of the universal postal union convention; and if he will make a statement;

(7) when he last discussed the subject of international remail with the chairman of the Post Office;

(8) if he will list in the Official Report the bilateral agreements signed on behalf of the Post Office relating to increased terminal dues.

Mr. Butcher: Details of the negotiation and implementation of terminal dues agreements between the Post Office and other postal administrations are an operational matter for the Post Office. I am therefore drawing my hon. Friend's inquiries on this matter to the attention of the chairman. It is, of course, a matter for indiviual postal administrations to decide whether to take action under article 23. My legal advice is that a collective decision by postal administrations to implement article 23 could be contrary to the treaty of Rome. This is also a matter for the Post Office.

Companies Registration Offices

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will publish the numbers given in the companies registration office staff return of May for staff working at each of the offices at Cardiff, London and Edinburgh.

Mr. Maude: The Registrar of Companies tells me that the numbers of staff employed on 3 May 1988 at Cardiff, London and Edinburgh were 805, 176½ and 49, respectively.

Quangos and Trading Funds

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list all quasi-autonomous non-Government organisations and all trading funds reporting to his Department.

Mr. Butcher: Particulars of non-departmental public bodies for which my Department was responsible on 1 April 1987 are shown in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1987", a copy of which is in the Library. None of the Department's activities are managed as trading funds.

Single European Market

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) why he invited the founder of the Sock Shop chain to take part in the Government's advertising campaign on 1992;

(2) why he invited Mr. Alan Sugar to take part in the Government's advertising campaign on 1992;

(3) why he invited Sir John Harvey-Jones to take part in the Government's advertising campaign on 1992.

Mr. Maude: Ms. Sophie Mirman, Mr. Alan Sugar and Sir John Harvey-Jones are among a number of nationally known figures who are supporting the single European market campaign. The extensive experience they bring of a wide range of business activities helps underline how important it is for British firms to understand the importance of the single market and to prepare accordingly.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many business men were invited to take part in the Government's advertising campaign on 1992; what was the purpose in issuing the invitations and what criteria were used in selecting those invited; how many of those invited agreed to take part; and if he will explain the purpose of the campaign and its costs to date.

Mr. Maude: A number of nationally known business figures are supporting the single European market campaign. Their message on the single market challenge to firms throughout the country is based on their own experience and plans in a very wide range of business activities. My right hon. and noble Friend and I are delighted that those concerned have so readily agreed to help underline the crucial importance of planning now for 1992.

The campaign has two main objectives: to increase business awareness of the single market and its significance, and to encourage firms to begin preparing now if they are to make the most of it. To date the advertising campaign has cost about £5·8 million.

MVDS/MMDS

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the Touche Ross study of MVDS/MMDS has now been concluded and whether the research undertaken indicates that MVDS/MMDS might be an appropriate transmission system for areas such as the Highlands and Islands of Scotland.

Mr. Butcher: The study of MVDS commissioned from Touche Ross management consultants has been completed, and is currently under consideration by the Government as part of our wider review of broadcasting. The Touche Ross study does not specifically address the suitability of MVDS for the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, though it makes clear that MVDS can be configured in a variety of ways to meet a range of requirements.

National Engineering Laboratory

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how he intends to safeguard the commercial-in-confidence information in the possession of the National Engineering Laboratory following the proposed privatisation of the laboratory; and what steps he will take to ensure that the successful bidder does not gain access to information paid for by competitors.

Mr. Butcher: Commercially sensitive information in the possession of the National Engineering Laboratory will be safeguarded through negotiation of appropriate provisions in the agreement with the purchaser.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to receive the Property Services Agency evaluation of the assets of the National Engineering Laboratory; and if he will place the information in the Library.

Mr. Butcher: The Property Services Agency has provided my Department with an evaluation of the assets of NEL. An extract is being placed in the Library covering those aspects being made available to possible bidders for NEL who have expressed an interest in receiving this information.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make it his policy that staff employed at the National Engineering Laboratory do not need to transfer to the proposed private company and may continue to remain within the Civil Service if they so choose.

Mr. Butcher: The transfer of staff from the National Engineering Laboratory to the new company is a matter for discussion with the successful bidder. I hope that as many as possible of the existing staff will transfer. If staff do not transfer to the new company, we shall use our best efforts to find them alternative jobs in the Department or elsewhere in the Civil Service, but I cannot guarantee that this will always be possible.

Research Establishments

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for East Kilbride on 28 June, Official Report column 169, on what date his Department consulted either the British Hydromechanics Research Association or the Production Engineering Research Association in the recent review of Department of Trade and Industry research establishments.

Mr. Butcher: Neither the British Hydromechanics Research Association nor the Production Engineering Research Association was amongst the organisations approached by DTI during the review of research establishments. BHRA and PERA took the initiative in contacting the Department about the review on 1 and 15 March, respectively.

Rover Group

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with Mr. Peter Sutherland concerning British Aerospace's takeover of the Rover Group.

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry met Commissioner Sutherland on 5 July; this was the most recent in a series of discussions held since March on the state aid application related to the acquisition by British Aerospace of Her Majesty's Government's shareholding in Rover Group. It could be prejudicial to these discussions—which are at an advanced state—and to the interests of the companies to pre-empt their outcome. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will inform the House when there is something conclusive to report.

Scotch Whisky (Japan)

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on Japanese duties on Scotch whisky.

Mr. Alan Clark: Japan's recent proposals for liquor tax reform are a positive response to this long-standing problem. When these are implemented, Scotch whisky will be subject to the same tax burden as domestic whisky in its third largest export market.

Professional Liability

Mr. Speller: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will set up a fourth study team into professional liability problems to investigate how the law affects solicitors liable for professional negligence as a result of their failure to have advised correctly on the financial implications of unusual commercial leases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: No. The professions on which three fact-finding studies are under way were selected from a wide range of professions, including solicitors, whose concerns about liability are well known to the Government. The results of the current studies will enable us to make an informed decision as to how serious the problems are and whether further consideration or action is needed, both for the professions now being studied and for others.

British Steel Corporation

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much European Economic Community cash the British Steel Corporation has received from 1979 to the latest date; if he will list the steelworks receiving such grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 30 June 1988]: In the period since 1979 the British Steel Corporation has received approximately £13·5 million from the EEC in respect of grants for research work. It is not possible to break this down by plant as the grants have been applied across the corporation. No other EEC grants have been made to BSC since 1979.

Charges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will provide a detailed breakdown for the years 1982-83 to 1990-91, by nature of item and functional area of charge, of the receipts to his programme classified as charges for the purposes of the public expenditure survey.

Mr. Butcher [holding answer 7 July 1988]: Table 1 shows income from charges for the years 1982-83 to 1990-91 for each subprogramme within my Department, excluding capital receipts and privatisation proceeds. The totals differ slightly from those provided by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary in his reply of 25 May 1988: first, they take account of the reclassification of certain launch aid levies; second, they have been updated to incorporate provisional outturn and Supply Estimate figures for 1987-88 and 1988-89, respectively. In addition to the charges identified in table 1, my Department receives income from charges related to running costs: these details are set out in table 2.

Barlow Clowes

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if his Department will provide special assistance to elderly investors in Barlow Clowes in registering their interests with the liquidators; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 7 July 1988]: I understand that the questionnaire used to register investors' interests by the special managers of Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers Ltd. is straightforward. However, if investors find any difficulty in registering their interest, or in making their more formal claims in the liquidation, the special managers or the Official Receiver respectively will be very willing to help.

Electric Plugs

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster pursuant to his answer of 22 June, Official Report, column 562, when he expects to know the legal position in other member states of the European Community concerning the fitting of electric plugs as standard to household electrical equipment.

Mr. Butcher [holding answer 8 July 1988]: There are variations throughout the Community on the legal requirements for fitting plugs to electrical applicances which rest largely on compliance with technical standards. Information on the detailed technical requirements in other members states of the Community is, or course, available from Technical Help to Exporters, which is part of the British Standards Institution at Milton Keynes.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Sheep (Radioactivity)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give a county by county breakdown of where the 33 blue-marked sheep were remonitored between 28 September 1987 and 1 June 1988.

Mr. Viggers: The sheep referred to were remonitored in Co. Londonderry.

Portavogie Road, Ballyhalbert (Flooding)

Mr. John. D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will investigate the flooding of the roadway and footways opposite 10 Portavogie road, Ballyhalbert, County Down; and what proposals he has to alleviate this flooding.

Mr. Needham: A road gully and associated drainage pipes will be installed before the end of August 1988, to alleviage the problem at this address.

Moat Road, Ballyhalbert (Animals)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many tigers, lions and pumas are being kept at 23 Moat road, Ballyhalbert; whether he is satisfied that there is no public health problem; and if he will make a statement on the controls and licences required for keeping non-domestic animals in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: I am informed by Ards borough council that four tigers and one puma are being kept at 23 Moat road, Ballyhalbert. There are also five panthers but no lions being kept on the premises. In the council's view there is no public health problem. In Northern Ireland the keeping of non-domestic animals is controlled under public health and animal welfare legislation. District councils have powers to take action if an animal is so kept as to be a nuisance or prejudicial to public health. The Department of Agriculture can intervene if an animal is being cruelly treated. Native species of wild animals protected under the Wildlife (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 cannot be kept without a licence from the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland.

Housing Benefit

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have lost housing benefit due to the introduction of a capital rule in April; and how many of these people will now be entitled to benefit as a result of the recent amendment to the legislation.

Mr. Needham: I regret that the information is not available.

Income Support

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland are relying on transitional protection as a result of the transfer from supplementary benefit to income support.

Mr. Needham: I regret that the information is not readily available at present. However, it is being collected as part of the income support annual statistical inquiry and should become available early in 1989.

Cost Limits

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the 1988-89 running cost limit for the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland departments.

Mr. Tom King: The running cost limit for 1988-89 for the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland departments is being set at £509·48 million. Further details of provision for individual departments are set out in the appropriate Estimates volumes.

Housing Executive

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East on 29 April, Official Report, columns 304-5, if he will indicate for each of the eight arbitrations mentioned what was the total sum claimed in respect of each, what was the sum paid to date in respect of each, how many are still to be settled, when he expects final settlement in each case and what was the date of practical completion in each case.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 21 June 1988]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I have been advised by the chief executive that the approximate total sum claimed quoted in column 305 of the Official Report of April 29 has been revised to £1,062 million and that the information requested is as follows:

Contract	Total sum claimed	Sum paid to date	Practical completion date
1	244,000	14,872	23 August 1978
2	79,000	17,000	No specific date
3	70,000	12,420	26 April 1982
4	66,000	5,000	20 September 1983
5	197,000	37,000	16 August 1985
6	271,000	nil	3 July 1981
7	147,000	nil	4 April 1986
8	550,000	172,000	1 August 1986

Two contracts (6 and 7) are still to be settled. Final settlement is anticipated during 1988.

Homelessness

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement regarding funding for voluntary organisations providing accommodation for the single homeless, indicating what measures he will take to ensure that the total level of revenue grants to these organisations in 1989-90 will at least equal the financial assistance given to them in 1986-87 by area boards and Government Departments.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 6 July 1988]: The draft Housing (NI) Order will contain a provision which will enable the Housing Executive to fund voluntary bodies concerned with homelessness. Discussions are currently under way between the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, the area health and social services boards, the Department of Health and Social Services and the Department of the Environment to ensure that the resources which will be made available to the Housing Executive when the order comes into operation will not be less than those currently allocated for funding of voluntary bodies providing accommodation for the homeless.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to adopt the system of measuring unemployment recommended by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Mr. Lee: In common with most countries in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), my Department's monthly unemployment figures are based on administrative records. However, my Department also publishes annual estimates of unemployment according to the International Labour Organisation's guidelines as interpreted by the OECD.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in the Official Report, for each of the last five years, for Great Britain and for the north-west region, the percentage and numerical increase in the size of the labour force, together with the percentage and numerical fall in unemployment.

Mr. Lee: Table A shows the level of the civilian working population (employees in employment, the self-employed and the unemployed) together with the change over the previous year expressed numerically and as a percentage for June of each year from 1983 to 1987 for Great Britain and the north-west region. Table B shows corresponding figures according to the seasonally adjusted series of unemployed claimants.

Higher Education Initiative

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if any institutions of higher education have been asked by the Manpower Services Commission or Government to bid for funding under the Manpower Services Commission enterprise in higher education initiative and refused to do so;

(2) what is the stage of negotiation between the Manpower Services Commission and universities regarding the Manpower Services Commission enterprise in higher education initiative;

(3) if a decision has been made on which bids by universities for funding under the Manpower Services Commission enterprise in higher education initiative have been successful;

(4) if notification has been given to universities as to the likelihood of their bids being successful under the Manpower Services Commission enterprise in higher education initiative.

Mr. Cope: No institution of higher education has refused to bid. The chairman of the Training Commission is writing to 11 institutions, including four universities, inviting them to enter contract negotiations.

Community Programme (Liverpool)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of Liverpool's community programme schemes, in particular the G Force project.

Mr. Nicholls: There will be sufficient places in Liverpool under the new programme employment training for every existing community programme provider who wishes to provide training of acceptable quality. The commission has now received more than enough bids to provide the planned number of places in Liverpool.

However, some community programme providers in Liverpool, particularly those operated by voluntary organisations including G. Force Ltd., may be prevented from participating in employment training by Liverpool city council's irresponsible decision to withdraw grants and the use of council premises from organisations involved in the new programme. The Training Commission will seek to ensure that there is alternative provision using other training providers, but as a result of the council's decision some projects which provide valuable services to disadvantaged groups in the local community may not be able to continue. I understand that G Force CP Ltd. is still considering its position in relation to employment training.

Employment Training (Merseyside)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the implementation of the employment training scheme in Merseyside.

Mr. Nicholls: Over 16,000 places under the new programme employment training have been allocated by the Training Commission to help unemployed people in Merseyside. Proposals have now been received from organisations which wish to take part as training managers offering to provide considerably more places than are required. I regret that some trade unions locally seek to misrepresent the objectives and conditions of the new programme. I also deplore the decision of Liverpool city council to withdraw grants and the use of premises from local organisations which become involved in employment training. Some 1,500 places on existing projects in the community may be at risk because of Liverpool city council's short-sighted action. Despite the city council's unwillingness to help long-term unemployed people to improve their chances of a job or self-employment, I am confident that we will be able to launch employment training successfully in September in Merseyside as in the rest of the country. The Government are determined that unemployed people should get the best help we can provide. Our new programme will do just that.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many incidents of fire have been reported, within the Channel tunnel site, during the present period of construction.

Mr. Nicholls: No fires have been reported to the Health and Safety Executive under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations (RIDDOR) since 1 April 1987. Although I understand the Kent fire brigade has been called to deal with some fire-related incidents on a number of occasions, none was sufficiently serious to report to the HSE.

Retirement Age

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the number of jobs which could be released if the state retirement age for men were reduced from 65 to 63 years of age.

Mr. Scott: I have been asked to reply.

Our best estimate is that a reduction in men's state pension age from 65 to 63 would in the short term release about 150,000 vacancies to be filled from either the unemployment register or other sources. Over the longer term, the number of vacancies would fall as both employers and employees responded to changed conditions. The assumptions on which these estimates are based are currently under review.

ENVIRONMENT

Canary Wharf

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the United Kingdom's total construction activity over the next 24 months he estimates will be focused on Canary wharf.

Mr. Trippier: No firm estimate is possible on the basis of information available to the Department.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what date the Canary wharf master building agreement between the London Docklands development corporation and Olympia and York specifies for the completion of the Limehouse link.

Mr. Trippier: The MBA obliges LDDC to use its reasonable endeavours to provide the road by 1992.

EC Water Directives

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what legal sanctions have been taken against water authorities which do not comply with European Economic Community directives.

Mr. Moynihan: The United Kingdom has a generally good record in implementing these directives, and to date the Government have not found it necessary to take legal action to enforce their provisions.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken in cases where a water authority has not complied with any European Economic Community directive on water.

Mr. Moynihan: The Department is in frequent contact with water authorities on the implementation of EC directives on water. The authorities make detailed reports on implementation to the Department covering such matters as the quality of drinking water, the authorisation of discharges, the monitoring of the aquatic environment, and methods of frequency of sampling. Where these reports indicate that the obligations of directives are not being complied with, authorities are instructed to take steps to remedy the position and, where necessary, to agree programmes with the Department.

Water Quality

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how the monitoring arrangements for water quality will be strengthened and clarified in the forthcoming legislation to privatise the water industry.

Mr. Moynihan: Monitoring of the quality of surface and underground waters will be a statutory duty of the National Rivers Authority, which will also be required to give effect to statutory quality objectives and standards for these waters. This will entail the use of more systematic and consistent sampling regimes, which are currently being developed.

In the case of drinking water supplies, regulations will be made fully incorporating into United Kingdom law the provisions of the EC drinking water directive and specifying the frequency of monitoring for individual parameters and the sampling locations.

Waste Tips

Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many waste tips in England and Wales have been identified by his pollution inspectorate as posing a potential risk to neighbouring communities; how many of these are already regarded as providing a serious risk; and what is his estimate of cost for introducing equipment to control escaping gas and avoiding danger to life and property.

Mr. Moynihan: The identification of risks to public health from waste disposal activities is a matter for local authorities. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution currently assessing information provided by the waste disposal authorities. I expect to receive its assessment and recommendations very shortly.

Toxic Waste (Imports)

Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list his powers to prevent toxic waste from the European Community or other countries overseas being imported for disposal in Great Britain; and if he has any plans to seek further powers to deal with the rising threat to the environment from such waste disposal.

Mr. Moynihan: The Control of Pollution Act 1974 provides powers for the Secretary of State to make regulations to prohibit or restrict the import of any substance if it is appropriate to do so to prevent damage to persons, animals or plants or pollution of air, water or land. Imports of special waste are of course subject to the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980 on arrival in this country. I propose to lay regulations to implement the directive on transfrontier shipment of hazardous wastes before the summer recess.

Waste Management Papers

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of waste management papers issued by his Department in each of the periods (a) 1974 to 1979, (b) 1979 to 1984 and (c) 1984 to 1988.

Mr. Moynihan: In 1974 to 1979; 15. In 1979 to 1984; 10. In 1984 to 1988; one.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many waste management papers he intends to issue in the remainder of the current year.

Mr. Moynihan: Two.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many waste management papers he intends to issue during the period 1988 to 1991.

Mr. Moynihan: There is no fixed programme for the publication of waste management papers. We are however aiming to issue two papers a year to 1991, as resources permit.

Land Wastes Division (Staff)

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the numbers of civil servants employed in the land wastes division of his Department in each of the years from 1974 to 1988.

Mr. Moynihan: The land wastes division of my Department was disbanded on 1 April 1987 with the creation of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (HMIP). The table shows the number of civil servants employed in the land wastes division as at 1 April for each year between 1980 and 1986. For 1987 and 1988 the table shows the number of civil servants employed on similar work in HMIP and the new noise, nuisance and waste division. The information is not readily available for earlier years.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to publish guidance upon appropriate standards for energy efficiency in existing residential buildings; and if he will make a statement on what he estimates to be the average potential for energy saving within the present stock.

Mrs. Roe: The British Standards Institution has just published a code of practice for the energy efficient refurbishment of housing. This Department and the Department of Energy have contributed to this work and it has had technical support from the Building Research Establishment (BRE). The Government have also published extensive guidance on how to improve the energy efficiency of existing dwellings, including this Department's guide "The Energy Efficient Renovation of Houses", and the Department of Energy's recently published home energy survey for householders. These publications provide comprehensive advice for house owners and landlords.

Considerable progress has been made in improving the energy performance of dwellings (as evident, for example, from the BRE evidence to the Select Committee on Energy). The BRE estimates that the average potential for cost-effective improvements to the energy performance of dwellings is about 20 per cent. of current energy consumption.

Television Monitor Annunciators (Palace of Westminster)

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many television monitor annunciators were replaced in the Palace of Westminster in the years 1985 to 1987; and what was the cost at current prices.

Mr. Chope: The maintenance contractor for the annunciator system in both Houses holds a small stock of monitors which are used, when necessary, to replace sets which have to be withdrawn for repair. Information on the number of times this occurred during the three years mentioned is not readily available. The stock of replacement monitors was replenished in 1986 by the purchase of five sets. The cost was approximately £1,300.

Waste (Imports)

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications for the enforceability through fines of the regulations governing the import of waste of the incidence of companies operating in this field with minimum paid-up share capital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The imposition of fines, or a penalty of imprisonment, is a matter for the courts to decide in the circumstances of each case. Prosecutions under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 may be made against companies, their directors or both.

Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to increase the staffing levels of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Mr. Moynihan: On its formation on 1 April 1987 the staffing levels of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution were at 70 per cent. of full complement. Since then recruitment has increased staffing levels to 90 per cent. of full complement. It remains a priority within the Department to fill the remaining vacancies within Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he expects to announce the locations of the housing action trusts; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will consider the following local authority estates for possible declaration as housing action trust areas; North Peckham and Gloucester grove (Southwark), Solander gardens, Shadwell gardens, Berner, Ocean, Boundary and Holland (Tower Hamlets), Loughborough and Argell tower (Lambeth);

(3) what criteria are being adopted by his Department in considering possible estates for declaration as housing action trust areas.

Mrs. Roe: I refer to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to the private notice question asked by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) today.

Local Government Superannuation Scheme

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet received representations from local government employers and unions about the contribution level to be paid by part-time employees wishing to buy added years for pension purposes under the local government superannuation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The two sides of local government have been unable to agree the contribution level to be required for these purposes. My right hon. Friend has decided that all employees eligible to benefit under these proposals should pay the same percentage of their salary if they wish to take advantage of this extension of the scheme. Subject to the resolution of remaining points of detail, draft amending regulations giving effect to that decision will be issued for statutory consultations as soon as possible.

Water Companies (Share Capital)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, to monitor the proportion of share capital in statutory water companies in the ownership of (a) person or bodies not concerned with water purification and (b) persons or bodies with a financial interest in water purification, who are, in either case, resident or registered, outside the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend has no special powers to acquire such information on the shareholdings in these private companies. he has only such information as has been placed in the public domain, mainly under the disclosure rules of the stock exchange.

Council Estates

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify the council estates submitted to his Department for consideration under the community refurbishment, estate action and priority estate project in the following areas (a) Lambeth, (b) Southwark, (c) Tower Hamlets, (d) Newham, (e) Leeds, (f) Sunderland and (g) Wolverhampton.

Mrs. Roe: The local councils have asked my Department to consider the following housing estates for estate action assistance, including community refurbishment schemes and priority estate project status:

(a) Lambeth
- Angell Town
- Clapham park East
- Moorlands, Southwyck House
- Stockwell Park

London Docklands (Alternative Housing)

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sites in the ownership of the London Docklands development corporation will be used to provide alternative housing for the tenants on St. Vincent's estate in Westferry road and the Causeway, the Barleymow estate, Narrow street, dwellings in Ming street and Dingle gardens, and Dolphin house in Poplar high street; what is the timetable for the demolition of the estates; what commitment the London Docklands development corporation has given to keep together the established communities in those estates; whether tenants will be given the opportunity to remain in their dwellings if they are not required for the construction of the road; what is the estimated cost of the rehousing of the 650 tenants to the London Docklands development corporation; and whether the London Docklands development corporation has been allowed to provide a direct subsidy to housing associations to build alternative housing on the lines of a housing association grant.

Mr. Trippier: These are detailed matters primarily for the LDDC and the borough to work out within the agreement they have reached.

Housing Association Rehabilitation Schemes

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on the mixed funding of housing association rehabilitation schemes; and what account he has taken of the effects of such a policy on the level of rents.

Mrs. Roe: Housing association rehabilitation schemes are eligible for mixed funding in the same way as other schemes. We expect associations to provide accommodation at rents within the reach of people in low-paid employment, and this should be possible within the financial regime we have established.

Housing Associations (Merseyside)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the mixed funding to be made available to housing associations in Merseyside during the present and next financial year.

Mrs. Roe: The Housing Corporation has made £2·94 million of grant available for use in mixed funding schemes for rent in its Merseyside region in the current financial year. Decisions about the allocation of Housing Corporation funds for 1989-90 have not yet been taken.

Domestic Waste

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing information available to him on typical landfill costs for domestic wastes in each of the member states of the European Community.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not available.

GLC Heritage Collection

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if any arrangements are being made for the public display of an accessibility to the items comprising the Greater London council's heritage collection; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The LRB is currently negotiating with the corporation of the City of London, which administers the Greater London record office for the transfer of the majority of the collection to the City on terms that would ensure that the collection will in the future be available for public display.

County Hall Site

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums are expected to be available for distribution to London boroughs from the development of the county hall site.

Mr. Chope: It is too early to say what sums will be available for distribution to London boroughs from the sale of the county hall site.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive document "The Way Forward," about the case for a repository for low to intermediate-level waste in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. friend has recieved a number of representations about Nirex's discussion document "The Way Forward". We have advised all respondents to make their views known to Nirex which will be submitting its proposals to the Government early next year.

Local Government Finance Bill

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Government amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill were tabled during Report stage in the House of Lords.

Mr. Ridley: The Government tabled 268 amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill at Lords Report. This figure includes consequential amendments, and five amendments which were subsequently not moved.

Regional Rivers Advisory Committees

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he has issued to water authorities and the National Rivers Authority advisory committee on the intended composition of the proposed regional rivers advisory committees; and whether he intends that voluntary wildlife conservation organisations should be able to nominate representatives to the regional rivers advisory committees.

Mr. Moynihan: The December policy statement on the National Rivers Authority made clear that the regional rivers advisory committees would represent the main interests concerned in both using and conserving the rivers. It will be for the National Rivers Authority, which will have the responsibility for making appointments to these committees, and to ensure that the various interests, including conservation organisations, are appropriately represented.

Water Industry (Conservation Offices)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether a conservation officer will be appointed to each National Rivers Authority region following any privatisation of the water industry.

Mr. Moynihan: This will be a matter for the National Rivers Authority advisory committee to consider in advising on the outline schemes of organisation submitted by the water authorities.

Water Industry Reorganisation

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place a copy of the respective water authorities' outline schemes for reorganisation, as submitted to his Department and the National Rivers Authority advisory committee, in the Library.

Mr. Moynihan: Until the schemes of organisation have been agreed with the water authorities, it would not be appropriate to publish them.

Pharaoh's Ants

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the problems of pharaoh's ant infection in high-rise blocks of flats; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe [holding answer 8 July 1988]: Pharaoh's ants are among a number of common pests that can infest buildings. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's Agricultural Development and Advisory Service at Slough can offer advice on the action that might need to be taken.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has received about the problems of pharaoh's ants in high-rise blocks of flats.

Mrs. Roe [holding answer 8 July 1988]: The only representations received in recent years were from the London borough of Greenwich, concerning problems on its Ferrier estate.

HIP and Council House Sales

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report for each metropolitan district council (a) the total housing investment programme expenditure (outturn) and (b) the total capital receipts from both the right to buy and other sales, for each year from 1980-81 to date.

Mrs. Roe [holding answer 8 July 1988]: The available information provided by the metropolitan district authorities is shown in the tables. In table 2 the receipts cover payments of mortgages and sales of land as well as initial receipts from the sale of dwellings.

London City Airport (Jet Aircraft)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement concerning the decision of the London Docklands development corporation to permit test flights of jet aircraft at the London City airport, in the light of paragraph 35 of his Department's letter of 23 May 1985.

Mr. David Trippier: Planning permission was granted, subject to conditions, by the London Docklands development corporation to the London City airport on 5 July allowing the airport to be used on three separate days to allow demonstration landings and take-offs by British Aerospace 146 aeroplanes. The permission expires on 31 July 1989. Once a planning permission has been granted I am not in a position to comment further on the matter.

DEFENCE

INF Treaty

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made to facilitate the work of inspection personnel from the Soviet Union in connection with the intermediate nuclear forces treaty; what costs have been incurred to date by this work; what costs are expected in the future; and what proportion of these costs will be borne by the United States of America.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Appropriate arrangements have been made for the reception, accommodation and escort of Soviet inspectors during INF inspections in the United Kingdom. The arrangements for meeting costs incurred as a result of INF inspections are set out in the basing country agreement, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Trawlers (Submarine Damage)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much compensation his Department has paid to trawler owners and crew following damage caused by Royal Navy submarines; and how many claims are currently outstanding.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Over the last 10 years my Department has paid out a total of about £500,000 in compensation to trawler owners and crews following damage caused by Royal Navy submarines. There are no claims currently outstanding.

Gibraltar Shootings

Mr. Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will specify those matters in relation to which Treasury counsel has indicated to the Gibraltar coroner that any members of Her Majesty's forces called to give evidence in the forthcoming inquest will refuse to answer questions; on what grounds this will be done; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Prior to the preliminary hearing Treasury counsel indicated to the coroner that, if he were to rule that such questions were relevant for the purposes of the inquest, our position would be that unquantifiable damage would be done to the security of the United Kingdom and Gibraltar unless the following categories of information were protected from disclosure:

a. The identities of members of the security forces, all details of any earlier deployment and (as regards individuals to whom such matters apply) the units with which they were serving, their specialist training and equipment, and previous operations;

b. All and any sources of intelligence information which is material, however indirectly, to the shootings; and

c. Any operational fact which might tend to reveal anything in (a) or (b) above, or any other intelligence which might be useful to the Crown on other occasions.

The two imperatives underlying this are the need to protect the integrity of military and security operations; and the need to protect the safety of security force personnel and their families, and their future usefulness.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what compensation has been paid to Mr. Vic Adams of Station road, Bolton on Dearne, arising from his presence at the scene of the Gibraltar shootings; and on what terms.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I can confirm that my Department considered a claim for compensation for Mr. Victor Adams on the normal basis of legal liability, and that compensation has been paid to Mr. Adams. It is not our practice to discuss details of settlements which are regarded as private between the Department and the individual concerned.

Project Al Yamamah

Sir Antony Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current status of the project Al Yamamah; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am very pleased to be able to announce that a formal understanding has been signed between the Government of the kingdom of Saudi Arabia and the Government of the United Kingdom, which will provide for a significant enhancement to the existing defence capabilities of the kingdom of Saudi Arabia in a major new phase of project Al Yamamah. The enhancements to the project involve the supply to the kingdom of Saudi Arabia of additional aircraft, a construction programme, and specialised naval vessels; the new agreement also involves a positive and constructive economic offset programme which should be of great benefit to the private sectors of both countries.

The understanding was signed on behalf of the Government of the kingdom of Saudi Arabia by His Royal Highness Prince Sultan bin Abdullah Aziz, second deputy Prime Minister, Minister of Defence and Aviation and Inspector General, and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

United States Forces

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list, for each year since 1979, the total numbers of United States Navy personnel at the military installations at (a) Thurso, (b) Marmond Hill, (c) Edgell, (d) Machriharish, (e) Holy Loch and (f) Glen Douglas.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 1 July 1988]: Information on the total number of United States military personnel at these facilities was provided in my reply to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on 3 December 1987 at columns 709-12. For security reasons I am not prepared to provide a more detailed breakdown of these figures.

Plastic Bullets (Northern Ireland)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many actions were brought against the Ministry of Defence by individuals or the families of individuals injured or killed by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland in each year since 1972;

(2) if for those actions brought against the Ministry of Defence by individuals or the families of individuals injured or killed by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland since 1972, he will list (a) the outcome in each case whether compensation was paid, to whom, in what amount and on what date and (b) for those cases settled out of court, amounts of compensation paid, to whom and on what date.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 8 July 1988]: I refer the hon. Member to the written answer of 30 March 1977 at column 155 and the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) on 4 March 1982 at column 213. Records show that since January 1987 a total of 12 claims have been made against the Ministry of Defence for injuries allegedly caused by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland. The details are as follows:

	Claims
1987	10
[1]1988	2

Records for the period before 1987 are not now held centrally and the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The amount of compensation paid to individual claimants cannot be disclosed because this information is held in confidence between the individual concerned and the Department. Two claims from 1987 have been settled by out of court payments of £500 each on 5 July 1988 and the other cases are still under consideration.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Child Abuse

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy on the training of social workers to deal with the problem of child sex abuse.

Mr. Newton: In my statement to the House on 6 July, at columns 1061-63, I announced a specific training grant of 70 per cent. in support of expenditure of £10 million in the child care field in 1989-90. This recognises the importance of social workers acquiring professional skills in the field of child abuse, including child sexual abuse, during qualifying training and induction processes, through in-service specialist training and external post-qualifying courses. In addition, while responsibility for training social workers lies with employers and academic institutions, we have set up, as announced on 30 October 1986 and 8 April 1987, a centrally funded interdisciplinary training initiative on child sexual abuse. Several of the projects so far established will be of benefit to social workers. Further projects are under consideration.

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the recorded statistics relating to child sex abuse reported to local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Child abuse statistics have not previously been held centrally. The NSPCC, from a sample covering areas including about 9 per cent. of the children in England and Wales, estimates that 7,119 children were added to child protection registers in England and Wales in 1987 because of child sexual abuse.

We announced on 9 July 1987 that arrangements would be made for the annual collection of national statistics on child abuse. The Department is carrying out a survey for the year ending 31 March 1988. It is planned to publish some provisional results from the survey later this year which will include the numbers on the registers recorded as cases of sexual abuse.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy when drafting guidelines on child abuse to require a full medical report with proper medical notes to be submitted before any emergency order removing a child from its parents is made.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's suggestion, but am doubtful whether such a requirement would be either practicable or appropriate in all possible emergency situations, for example if there is an immediate risk of physical violence or if the need is to secure medical examination of the child where there is reason to believe that abuse is taking place.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will initiate a national survey into the extent and definition of child sexual abuse and other forms of abuse of children.

Mr. Newton: The Department undertook in April this year a pilot survey of all child abuse registers in England and Wales, identifying various categories of abuse including child sexual abuse. The provisional results of that survey will be available this autumn, and a regular annual return will be introduced from next year.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the implementation by local authorities of section 1 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authorities have now established the numbers and needs of people with disabilities under the requirements of section 1 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Scott: Local authorities have a clear duty under section 1 of the Act to inform themselves of the number of disabled people requiring services; to make arrangements for meeting any needs identified; and to provide information about relevant services. It is for local authorities to ensure that they fulfil these statutory duties.

"Look After Your Heart" Campaign

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the achievements of the "Look After Your Heart" campaign.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the progress of the "Look After Your Heart" campaign.

Mrs. Currie: Since the launch of "Look After Your Heart"—the first major heart disease prevention campaign in England—in April 1987, it has been continuously evaluated to assess its effect. This evaluation shows that during the first year of the campaign knowledge of the main risk factors for coronary heart disease has grown, particularly amongst lower social class groups, where 41 per cent. now know about the risks of a high-fat diet, 43 per cent. are aware of the risk of heart disease through smoking and 51 per cent. know that exercise can help avoid heart disease.

The campaign has been notably successful in securing the active co-operation of industry and commerce. One way has been through a scheme of "healthy living" contracts, which some 75 companies, employing almost 2 million people, have signed. Many more are waiting to do so.

Community activity has been stimulated and supported in 172 health authorities and 65 local authorities, with "Look After Your Heart" community grants funding some 118 projects to the extent of £260,000. It is planned to continue this scheme into the next phase of the campaign, and we are also looking at ways of supporting longer-term projects.

We are now consulting widely on the campaign's longer-term development, including possible further media campaigns in 1988-89 seeking to convince those most at risk to heart disease that "Look After Your Heart" matters to them.

Pensioner Organisations

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met representatives of pensioners' organisations; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Scott: I met representatives of Pensioners' Voice on 9 May, when we discussed a wide range of matters affecting the elderly.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much extra recognition the current year's nurses' pay award gives to those nurses with extra skills and responsibilities.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friends the Members for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) on 14 June at columns 159-60.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures he is taking to standardise pay for hospital sisters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The new clinical grading structure for nurses seeks to recognise and reward different levels of skill and responsibility. It provides a range of grades and pay scales for ward sisters, depending on the duties and responsibilities of the post occupied. Comprehensive guidance has been issued to health authorities with a view to ensuring that the grading definitions are consistently applied.

Family Credit

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding arrangements for claims for family credit by self-employed persons.

Mr. Portillo: Several representations have been received about the rules regarding the acceptability of accounts, and some others about the effects of the arrangements in particular cases.

Benefits

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he used in determining the level by which social security benefits are uprated.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to section 63 of the Social Security Act 1986. In common with our predecessors, we choose to measure movements in prices by means of the retail prices index. We shall continue to exercise our discretion over the uprating of benefits for which there is no statutory requirement to uprate.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of disabled people now employed at the Department of Health and Social Security office at Richmond house; and if he will list the grades that disabled people hold at this office.

Mr. Scott: There are four registered disabled people employed in the Department's office at Richmond house: one principal, one administrative officer, one telex operator and one messenger. In addition, there are other disabled people employed there but who prefer not to register as disabled.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that health authorities maintain the provision of commercial hearing aids regardless of the imposition of value added tax.

Mr. Scott: The imposition of VAT on hearing aids will not affect NHS patients since they are issued with their appliances, whether from the NHS range or commercial models, on free loan from health authorities. The health authorities already pay VAT on their purchases; the new ruling therefore makes no difference to their costs.

Restraint Garments (Moss Side Special Hospital)

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the recorded number of uses of restraint garments, for (a) women and (b) men, at Moss Side special hospital, for the periods September to November 1987 and February to April 1988.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

		Number
1 September 1987—30 November 1987	(a)	14
	(b)	375
1 February 1988—30 April 1988	(a)	13
	(b)	350

Pension Age

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to bring forward proposals on the Green Paper on a decade of retirement.

Mr. Scott: Options for changes in pension age are under active consideration, but it is not yet possible to say when work will be completed.

Carers

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he plans to publish any further material on carers gathered from the 1985 general household survey.

Mrs. Currie: We have no plans at this stage to publish any further material from the carers data gathered in the 1985 general household survey. The data collected will be made available by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys to research organisations which may publish further material at a later date.

Women Doctors

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in the discussions with the General Medical Services Committee concerning implementation of the proposals designed to achieve the entry of more women doctors into the medical profession, contained in the White Paper "Promoting Better Health"; when he expects those discussions to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Discussions with the GMSC about the White Paper encompass a whole range of reforms including changes necessary to increase the number of women doctors in general practice. Because of the integrated nature of the package, we have agreed with the profession's leaders that it would not be right to disclose any of the details until our discussions with them on all the changes identified in the White Paper have been completed and we can announce the full package. In view of the range of changes under consideration that is unlikely to be for some time.

AIDS

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy with regard to the provision of clean needles for injecting drug misusers in order to reduce the spread of HIV.

Mr. Newton: Injection drug misusers must be warned of the many risks of drug misuse in general and injecting in particular and discouraged from both. However, it is clearly important that if misusers cannot or will not stop injecting, they should not share injecting equipment.

We are currently evaluating the part which needle and syringe exchange schemes can play in reducing the extent of sharing among injecting drug misusers. A recent report from the researcher evaluating 14 experimental schemes confirms early evidence of some promising features of these schemes. We will shortly issue guidance to health authorities in England based on the evaluation so far, in order that those local agencies which consider it in their interest to establish schemes should operate them as effectively and responsibly as possible.

Additionally, retail pharmacies may sell needles and syringes to drug misusers.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest available figure for the number of patients with AIDS who have acquired listeria.

Mr. Newton: Figures for the number of patients with AIDS who have acquired listeria are not collected.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest available figure for the number of patients with AIDS who have died as a result of listeria.

Mr. Newton: There were no deaths registered in England and Wales for which AIDS or HIV infection was known by OPCS to be the underlying cause of death which also contained a reference on the death certificate to listeria (International Classification of Diseases 9th Revision codes 027·0 and 771·2) in the three years 1985 to 1987.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of the AIDS virus HIV-2 have been identified to date in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the Greater Manchester area; and what tests are being carried out to detect this strain of the virus.

Mr. Newton: To the end of June this year, two cases of infection with HIV-2 have been identified and reported to the communicable disease surveillance centre. Neither case was reported from the Greater Manchester area. Regional transfusion centres identify donors who have recently visited or have lived, after 1977, in certain West African countries where HIV-2 is known to be prevalent and send a sample of their blood to the public health laboratory service to be tested for HIV-2. So far no cases have been identified in this way. Since May 1987 all specimens sent to the central public health laboratory through the routine laboratory reporting system for HIV-1 testing have also been tested for HIV-2.

Social Security Appeals

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the approximate average time between the lodging of an appeal to the social security appeals tribunal and the hearing of the appeal in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland, (c) Orkney and (d) Shetland;

(2) how many appeals to the social security appeals tribunals lodged on or after 1 January 1986 were not heard by a tribunal until a date later than 12 months after receipt of the appeal in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland, (c) Orkney and (d) Shetland.

Mr. Portillo: The national administrative statistics for social security appeal tribunals, which are the source for average times between the lodging of appeals and hearing, are not disaggregated for areas smaller than a social security region.

For the quarter ending 30 September 1987 (the latest information available) the average time from lodgement of appeal to hearing in Great Britain was 23.2 weeks and in Scotland, including Orkney and Shetland, it was 26·3 weeks.

The information about appeals which are heard more than 12 months after being lodged is not available in the form requested but in Great Britain, for the quarter ended 30 September 1987, 937 appeals were heard and decided which had been lodged at least 12 months previously. The equivalent figure for Scotland, including Orkney and Shetland, was 225.

Friars House (Security)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take in regard to the security of his Department's premises, in the light of the repeated acts of entry, theft and vandalism at Friars house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Whilst it would be inappropriate to provide the hon. Member with precise details of security arrangements in each of the Department's buildings I can assure him that the security of the Department's premises is under constant review and, when necessary, action is taken to improve security.

Residential Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of the residents of private residential and nursing homes have received his Department's support towards the costs of their accommodation for each year since 1978.

Mr. Portillo: Accurate information about the percentage of residents in private residential care and nursing homes who are in receipt of income support (formerly supplementary benefit) is not available. Estimated information on the percentage of residents in private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes in receipt of supplementary benefit between 1979 and 1986 was provided for the joint central and local government working party on supplementary benefit and residential care. A copy of the working party's report "Public Support for Residential Care", published July 1987, is held in the Library.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action his Department takes to monitor the wage levels and conditions of service of staff employed in private residential and nursing homes.

Mrs. Currie: The pay and conditions of service of the staff employed in these homes are a matter for the employer and the staff.

Consultants

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the proportion of consultations undertaken in the private health sector which have resulted in patients seeing the same hospital consultant they would otherwise have seen within the National Health Service, for each year since 1979.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that this information is not available centrally.

Listeria

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence is available to his Department of sources of listeria infection other than food.

Mrs. Currie: Listeria is an organism known to be found widely in the environment. It is present, for example, in silage, sewage sludge, vegetable matter and river water. Listeriosis remains an uncommon cause of human disease.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether there have been any deaths in the United Kingdom from listeria in recent years.

Mrs. Currie: Listeria is classified in the International Classification of Disease (ICD), ninth revision, under two separate codes: ICD 027.0 (Listeriosis) and ICD 771.2 (Other congenital infections, which includes congenital listeriosis).

The number of death registrations in the United Kingdom in the years 1979 to 1986 which have had either of these codes assigned as underlying cause of death are shown in the table. The numbers assigned to ICD 771.2 are solely those relating to the congenital listeriosis element of this code.

New College, Cardiff (National Insurance)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the value of the unpaid class 2 national insurance contributions deemed to have been paid in respect of employees at New college, Cardiff, in respect of (a) the period prior to 6 April 1984 and (b) since.

Mr. Portillo: No unpaid class 2 contributions were deemed to have been paid in respect of employees at New college school, Cardiff, prior to 6 April 1984 or subsequently. Following discussions on employment status, class 1 contributions due for the period from 6 April 1980 to 5 April 1984 in respect of some part-time employees at the school were waived by the local DHSS office on 3 April 1985. The total sum involved amounted to nearly £16,575.

Junior Doctors

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if in the light of the junior doctors' conference resolution for an application for a judicial review of junior doctors' hours of work, he intends to take further action to reduce the hours worked by junior doctors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: On 7 June I announced, with the agreement of the profession's representatives, a programme to eliminate, wherever possible, regular rota commitments requiring junior hospital doctors to be on duty, on average, for more than one night and one weekend in three. Health authorities are expected to report to the Department by the end of July on how they proposed to take forward this task.

Women's Refuges

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of places per 10,000 women at women's refuges in the Greater London area.

Mr. Portillo: There are no official statistics kept centrally in this form. However, the Women's Aid Federation (England), (WAF(E)), estimates that the number of refuge groups in the Greater London area is 39, 19 of which are affiliated to WAF(E). The 19 affiliated groups consist of 25 refuges with 349 places.

Laparoscopy

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many laparoscopy operations were performed on (a) an out-patient basis and (b) an hospitalised patient basis in each health authority for each of the past two years.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that this information is not available centrally.

Well Woman Clinics

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of well woman clinics run by each health authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that this information is not available centrally.

Endometriosis

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has carried out any research into the disease endometriosis; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Research on medical matters falls within the sphere of the Medical Research Council, which is the main Government body for biomedical and clinical research in this country, and receives its grant-in-aid from the Department of Education and Science.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to revise or update the guidance given to medical practitioners with respect to the assessment of disablement for severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Portillo: We have no immediate plans to do so.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to reduce the length of time taken to process claims for severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Portillo: The Department is constantly seeking ways of improving the delivery of its various benefits, including severe disablement allowance. If the hon. Member has a particular case in mind, perhaps she would write to me about it.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to improve the standard of (a) medical and (b) non-medical adjudication of claims for severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Portillo: The standards of both lay and medical adjudication are kept under continuing review. I am not aware of any specific difficulties, but if the hon. Member has any particular problem in mind I will look into it.

Social Fund

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report the model profile of expected expenditure from the social fund, referred to in paragraph 2042 of the social fund manual, showing the planned levels of expenditure month by month.

Mr. Portillo: The information is as follows. The figure for April reflects the fact that it is only a part month for the purposes of the social fund in 1988-89. The model profile is the same for both grants and loans budgets.

Percentage of annual gross budget

	Per cent.
April	2·23
May	8·88
June	8·88
July	8·88
August	8·88
September	8·56
October	9·47
November	9·49
December	8·27
January	7·87
February	9·19
March	9·40
Total	100·00

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the social fund budget forecasts of the Derby London road and Becket street offices for each month up to the end of 1988-89.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested, as a percentage of the annual budget in each case, is as follows:

	Derby Becket Street		Derby London Road
	Grants	Loans	Grants	Loans
July	9·39	9·16	10·29	8·97
August	9·39	9·16	10·29	8·97
September	9·05	8·83	9·92	8·65
October	10·01	9·77	10·98	9·57
November	10·03	9·79	11·00	9·59
December	8·74	8·53	9·59	8·35
January	8·32	8·12	9·12	7·95
February	9·72	9·48	10·65	9·28
March	9·94	9·70	10·90	9·50

There have been technical problems with the social fund microcomputers, affecting the statistics, which are being corrected as quickly as possible. As a result, these figures may be subject to revision.

Local office monthly profiles of forecast expenditure are indicative only and are not a series of monthly budgets. They are automatically adjusted at the end of each month to take account of actual expenditure and may also be adjusted by the local office manager in the course of the year in the light of further information. Actual expenditure may well vary from that forecast.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many social fund inspectors have reviewed more than two cases;

(2) what was the total number of hours worked by social fund inspectors up to 27 June; how much of that time was spent in reviewing the cases received by them; and how the rest of their time was spent.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. I am advised by the social fund commissioner that up to 30 June 1988 the total number of hours worked by social fund inspectors was 7,826. Four social fund inspectors had reviewed more than two cases. When not reviewing cases social fund inspectors have been undergoing training.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the numbers and amounts of budgeting loans, crisis loans and community care grants made by social fund officers at the Derby London road and Becket street local offices in May analysed by clients groups, within application purpose and within application type.

Mr. Portillo: In view of the volume of information involved, I will write to the hon. Member with the figures.

Mr. Raffan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will announce the allocation of social fund budgets to the local office at Deeside.

Mr. Portillo: On 23 May a new local office at Deeside assumed responsibility for serving some of the areas previously served by the local offices at Rhyl and Wrexham. Accordingly, the allocations to Rhyl and Wrexham have been reduced proportionately and the money reallocated to Deeside. The new allocations are as follows:

	Grants budget £	Loans budget £	Period of allocation
Deeside	53,752	126,939	23 May 1988—31 March 1989
Rhyl	109,152	251,676	1 May 1988—31 March 1989
Wrexham	146,288	340,749	1 May 1988—31 March 1989

Reflex Anal Dilatation Test

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will commission a study into the clinical reliability of the reflex anal dilatation test.

Mr. Newton: As I indicated in my statement to the House last week, the Standing Medical Advisory Committee was asked to consider the whole issue of diagnosing sexual abuse of children, in parallel with the Cleveland inquiry. Its advice was published at the same time as the inquiry report, and states clearly that "no physical sign can at the present time be regarded as being uniquely diagnostic of child sexual abuse."

Parental Rights and Responsibilities

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will propose the enactment into law of principles 2, 6 and 7 of the Declaration of the Rights of the Child 1959, which relate to parental rights and responsibilities to their children;

(2) whether he will introduce legislation to replace the place of safety order with an emergency order with a return date of less than seven days, and with strict undertakings given by the applying authority to award damages if wrongly given;

(3) if he will bring forward legislation giving every parent an automatic right to a second medical opinion of their choice in any procedure which may result in the removal of their child;

(4) what safeguards for parents he intends to introduce into legislation as a result of the Butler-Sloss report on child abuse in Cleveland;

(5) whether he will introduce legislation making parents parties in all proceedings relating to their children;

(6) whether he will introduce legislation to ensure that all applications relating to the removal of children from their parents will be made to a judge.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my statement to the House on 6 July at columns 1061-63 about Lord Justice Butler-Sloss's report of her inquiry into the handling of suspected child abuse in Cleveland. This referred specifically to new rights and safeguards for parents. The Government are considering what modifications should be made to their proposals for legislation in the light of the report, and will also consider those of my hon. Friend's points not provided for in the 1987 White Paper.

Supplementary Benefit and Income Support

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to be able to answer the question from the hon. Member for Birkenhead, relating to the answers given to the hon. Member for Birkenhead on 19 May, Official Report, columns 550-52, on supplementary benefit and income support, due for answer on 8 June.

Mr. Portillo: I replied to the hon. Member on 8 July.

Kensington (Expenditure and Benefit)

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he plans to answer the question from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East due for answer on 28 June, on expenditure and benefit figures relating to Kensington.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: I hope to reply to the hon. Member tomorrow.

Abortion (Carlisle)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if the Carlisle baby was examined immediately after abortion; and at what lengths of time following the abortion examinations were conducted and with what results;

(2) what tests were conducted on the Carlisle baby or her mother to determine that the Carlisle baby suffered from Ehlers Danlos syndrome;

(3) what was the cause of death entered on the neotatal death certificate in the case of the Carlisle baby;

(4) whether existing rules, regulations or contingency plans for the event of a live birth following an abortion were followed in the case of the Carlisle baby;

(5) if resuscitation equipment was available in the same building as that in which the abortion of the Carlisle baby occurred;

(6) how long after the death of the Carlisle baby the hospital authorities, the senior registrar and the consultant concerned were informed of the death;

(7) what information he had received concerning the reasons why the doctor on duty at the abortion of the Carlisle baby did not call the consultant concerned when it was discovered that the baby had been born live;

(8) why the mother of the Carlisle baby was not told that her baby was born alive; and if this is in accordance with common medical practice;

(9) how long after the death of the Carlisle baby the Carlisle health authority informed the police, the regional health authority, the registrar, the coroner, the mother's general practitioner or his Department of the death;

(10) if the fact that the Carlisle baby was born alive following abortion appears on any medical notes or statutory forms written by the doctors or members of the health authority concerned;

(11) which member of the medical staff concerned in the abortion of the Carlisle baby instructed that the body should be incinerated;

(12) what instructions were given by health authority representatives to staff involved concerning the abortion of the Carlisle baby;

(13) how long after the death of the Carlisle baby the body was incinerated.

Mr. Newton: I am asking the chairman of the district health authority to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services on which of the grounds given in the Abortion Act 1967 the abortion of the Carlisle baby was performed.

Mr. Newton: Information relating to an individual identifiable termination of pregnancy cannot be released on grounds of confidentiality.

Ehlers Danlos Syndrome

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his departmental medical advisers consider Ehlers Danlos syndrome to be a serious disability;

(2) if he will list the number of abortions conducted for Ehlers Danlos syndrome since the introduction of the Abortion Act 1967;

(3) if he will list the number of people known to have died or been seriously incapacitated as a result of Ehlers Danlos syndrome.

Mr. Newton: Ehlers Danlos syndrome is a rare condition which can have serious manifestations. I regret that the information in the exact format requested is not available.

Ehlers Danlos syndrome is part of the international classification of diseases (ICD) 9th revision code 756.8

"Other specified anomalies of muscle, tendon, fascia and connective tissue", which contains a number of other conditions besides Ehlers Danlos syndrome.

Readily available information for the years 1985 and 1986 indicates that in these two years combined, there were fewer than five abortion notifications received which were coded to ICD 756.8.

The table shows the number of deaths registered in England and Wales since 1979 which have had 756.8 assigned as the underlying cause of death. Sufficiently detailed information on serious incapacitation as a result of this syndrome is not available.

Family Spending Power

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the manner of his answer of 8 March, Official Report, columns 181-90, he will publish tables showing the net weekly spending power for each of (a) a couple with a child aged 11 years, (b) a couple with two children aged eight and 11 years, (c) a couple with three children aged eight, 11 and 15 years and (d) a couple with four children aged three, eight, 11, and 15 years, with weekly earnings of £60 to £170 (at £10 intervals) under (i) the tax and benefit system before April and (ii) the system in place following the concessions announced on 27 April but prior to the implementation of the 1988 Budget changes; and if he will add a column showing the difference between two systems in every circumstance.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 6 May 1988]: Hypothetical illustrations showing the effects of the housing benefit transitional protection arrangements announced on 27 April can be set out on the basis requested only if they are expressed in cash terms and compare the tax and benefit systems in April 1987 and April 1988. The results are therefore hypothetical in four quite separate senses. First, average local authority housing charges mask the wide-variety of rents and domestic rates that local authority tenants actually pay. Secondly, they do not reflect the wide variety of families' circumstances and their housing arrangements in the relevant parts of the income distribution. Thirdly, and of particular importance in this context, it is not possible within the confines of the tax-benefit model tables to take account of earnings growth between April 1987 and April 1988. Fourthly, in practice, full-time earners will be benefiting from lower tax rates and higher real tax thresholds arising out of this year's Budget when they begin to receive their transitional protection. In this sense, and because the tables implicitly assume zero earnings growth, the illustrations are more than usually difficult to interpret.

Notes:
1. Old scheme as at April 1987 benefit, NI and tax rates.
2. New scheme as at April 1988 benefit and NI rates, and April 1987 tax rates.
3. FIS transitional protection is assumed not to be payable in any case.
4. Other assumptions used are those set out in "Impact of the Reformed Structure of Income-Related Benefits," October 1987.
5. Cash differences to benefits in kind have been neutralised because conversion of free school meals and welfare milk to cash is compensated at April 1988 prices within Family Credit. Cash differences to fares to work are also neutralised since these do not come within the scope of the tax and benefit systems. Water charges have been neutralised by removing them from both the pre and post reform tables (£1·70 and £1·78 per week, respectively). Under income support, water service charges are treated like any other part of household expenditure.
6. The tables are designed to illustrate transitional protection assuming zero cash earnings growth. Cash differences outside the range of the benefit system are therefore irrelevant to the impact of transitional protection.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will consider revising the 1974 circular on local authorities' duties in relation to the mentally ill in order to clarify these duties;

(2) if he will outline the progress which has been made on the implementation of the proposals for the care of the mentally ill contained in the Social Services Select Committee report of 1984-85 on community care.

Mr. Newton [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The question of revision of the 1974 circular on the duties of local authorities in relation to mentally ill people was one of three recommendations concerning mental illness (Nos. 47, 48 and 51) which the Social Services Committee in its report of 1984-85 specifically addressed to the Department. An interim response to these recommendations was given in Cm. 9674 and the present position is as follows:

Recommendation 47: The revision of departmental planning guidance on hospital accommodation for mentally ill people is now virtually complete and publication of a health building note is expected shortly.

Recommendation 48: The duties of local authorities in relation to non-medical services for mentally ill people (circular 19/74) are being considered in the light of Sir Roy Griffiths' report on community care, on which Government proposals will be presented in due course.

Recommendation 51: £269,000 of the £5,584,000 available in 1988-89 under the Department's "Opportunities for Volunteering" scheme has been allocated to MIND for projects relating to unemployed people recovering from mental illness.

Ear, Nose and Throat Patients

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes there have been in the numbers on ear, nose and throat in-patient waiting lists for regional health authorities between 1982 and 1987.

Mr. Newton [holding answer 4 July 1988]: The information requested is given in the table.

Number of cases on in-patient waiting list in each regional health authority at 30 September 1982 and 1987[1] for the specialty Ear, Nose and Throat

Sole Traders (Accounts)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services in what circumstances, and for what reason, the unaudited accounts of a sole trader which would be accepted as evidence of profits for tax purposes are not so accepted for the purposes of a claim for family credit; and whether the additional accountants' fees payable in connection with the claim are taken into account in assessing entitlement to family credit.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 4 July 1988]: There is no requirement for self-employed persons to provide any accounts in support of a claim for family credit. Net profit for family credit purposes is arrived at on a basis different from that for tax purposes, by reference to gross receipts and only those expenses allowable under family credit legislation. The necessary information may be provided by completing a form supplied by the Department or by submitting accounts, as the person wishes. If the person chooses to submit accounts, the Family Credit (General) Regulations specify the type of accounts which are acceptable and the period which they must cover. Since there is no requirement to provide such accounts additional accountants' fees should not be entailed in connection with a claim to family credit. Nevertheless, accountants' fees in general would usually be regarded as an allowable business expense in calculating net profit for family credit purposes.

Several representations have been received about the rules governing the acceptability of accounts, and we are considering whether any changes are called for.

Single Payments

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average amount of grant and loan sums paid out by local officers of his Department in single payments between 11 April and 11 July in 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987 in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde region and (c) Greenock and Port Glasgow; and what was the average amount of single payment in each of those years.

Mr. Portillo: Single payments of supplementary benefit were made in the form of grants and not loans. Information is not available for the exact dates requested and records for 1983-84 are no longer held. The figures given in the table represent the average value of each single payment made in three of the Department's four-week statistical periods in each year running from May to July.

	Scotland £	Strathclyde £	[1]Greenock £	[1]Port Glasgow £
9 May 1984 to 31 July 1984	86	86	100	67
8 May 1985 to 30 July 1985	89	89	84	78
7 May 1986 to 29 July 1986	86	94	84	86
6 May 1987 to 28 July 1987	80	77	87	60

[1] The boundaries of the local offices at Greenock and Port Glasgow are not conterminous with those of the hon. Member's constituency.

The average single payment for the whole statistical years (April to April) for Scotland was as follows:

1984-85	85
1985-86	88
1986-87	85
1987-88	77

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Conventional Force Reductions and Human Rights

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on linking progress in conventional force reductions in Europe with progress on human rights issues; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Our policy was set out in paragraphs 8-12 of the statement on "Conventional Arms Control: The Way Ahead" issued under the authority of the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Brussels, 2-3 March 1988, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House.

Disarmament

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation to decide its mandate for the conventional arms reduction talks; and what proposals Her Majesty's Government have made to their North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts on the contents of the mandate.

Mr. Mellor: The NATO allies tabled a mandate for the conventional stability talks in Vienna on 27 July last year.

Iran-Pakistan (Nuclear Co-operation)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications for nuclear non-proliferation of nuclear co-operation between Iran and Pakistan.

Mr. Mellor: As a signatory to the non-proliferation treaty Iran is bound to accept full scope safeguards on all her nuclear facilities. We have no conclusive evidence of any nuclear co-operation between Iran and Pakistan.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on the proposals made by Mr. Shevardnadze to the United Nations general assembly session on disarmament in June for (a) an exchange of data on levels of troops and equipment, (b) cutbacks by each side of half a million troops and (c) the reformation of remaining forces to give them a purely defensive character; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In so far as the remarks in Mr. Shevardnadze's speech recognise the need for on-site verification to accompany data exchanges and for asymmetries to be eliminated as a precondition for mutual force reductions, they are welcome. They represent a movement towards the approach to conventional arms control of allied countries, whose forces are already configured for purely defensive purposes. But they need to be translated into appropriate action by Soviet arms control negotiators.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken, in view of his support for the ballistic missile treaty, to urge upon both the United States and the Soviet Governments the desirability of holding the anti-ballistic missile review conference within the due period, and of using the occasion to renew their mutual commitment to the treaty.

Mr. Mellor: The 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty is a bilateral agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union. It is for the parties to the treaty to determine their rights and obligations under it, including the timing and content of review conferences.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the other arrangements for the third review conference on the anti-ballistic missile treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union have been made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: It is for the parties to the 1972 anti-ballistic missile treaty to decide on arrangements for the third review conference and to make them public when appropriate. The Government will follow developments with keen interest.

Fiji

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to whether all political prisoners held during the two military coups in 1987, and in connection with the recent arms smuggling allegations, have now been released by the Fijian Government.

Mr. Eggar: We are not aware of any political prisoners being held in Fiji. We understand, however, that there have been a small number of detentions in the last few days in connection with arms smuggling.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what consultations have taken place with Her Majesty's Government concerning the establishment of a new constitution of the Republic of Fiji;

(2) whether advice on a new constitution will be given in future by Her Majesty's Goverment to the Republic of Fiji.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the Prime Minister of Fiji, when he was in London on 29 March, that Britain was ready to offer advice to Fiji in working out a new constitution.

Israel

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received from Her Majesty's consul general in Jerusalem on invitations to Israeli school children to beat Palestinian prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: We have received no independent corroboration of press reports about this matter.

Security Services

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will issue a directive to the director general of MI6 setting out the parameters of lawful activity, along the lines of the Maxwell Fyfe directive of 24 September 1952; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: It has been the long-established practice of this and previous Governments not to comment on such matters.

El Salvador

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the report of the United Kingdom observers sent to the 20 March elections in El Salvador to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: A copy of the report by Dr. David Browning has now been laid on the table of the House. The report has now been published, and copies have been placed in the Library.

The report's findings are that, despite the difficult conditions imposed by the continuing civil war, the conduct of the elections was reasonably free, fair and secure; that voters were presented with a real, albeit limited choice; and that the election provided a genuine opportunity for voters to express an opinion about the record of previously elected representatives.

The report is a balanced and objective assessment of the way in which the legislative and municipal elections were conducted, and I commend it to those who have an interest in El Salvador.

Helsinki Final Act

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress on implementation by the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries of the provision of the Helsinki Final Act during the last six months.

Mr. Mellor: During the last six months to 30 June 1988, Soviet and East European implementation of their Helsinki commitments has been closely monitored, particularly in the light of the third CSCE follow-up meeting which continues in Vienna. One of the main features of the period under review is a widening of disparities in eastern implementation reflecting differing attitudes on political and social reform. In some countries overall developments continued to be favourable; in some limited progress was noted; in some there has been no improvement at all; while in one case there was an apparent deterioration in the human rights situation.

SECURITY IN EUROPE: PRINCIPLES REGARDING RELATIONS BETWEEN PARTICIPATING STATES; CONFIDENCE-BUILDING MEASURES AND CERTAIN ASPECTS OF SECURITY AND DISARMAMENT (BASKET I)

Widespread violation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms covered by principle VII, including freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief continued.

With the progressive evolution of Mr. Gorbachev's policies of glasnost and democratisation, however, there have been continued improvements in the implementation of basic rights in the Soviet Union. The Communist party has proclaimed that the state bears responsibility to its citizens, as well as vice versa. However, key legal guarantees which would serve to institutionalise these developments are still evidently at the drafting stage.

The "unofficial" Public Commission for International Co-operation on Humanitarian Issues and Human Rights set up last year has not so far had any clear positive influence on human rights abuses, although its chairman, Professor Fedor Burlatsky, has in recent months met representatives of prominent Western human rights organisations (for example, Amnesty International). New legislation governing procedures for appeal against official and administrative abuses came into force on 1 January 1988 but it is widely recognised to be flawed by a proviso that only individual officials can be sued. Many of the decisions to which Soviet citizens object are taken collectively, thus depriving them of legal redress. Very few cases have so far been initiated under the new law.

There has been much greater tolerance of public criticism and debate by the Soviet authorities, particularly in the case of past policies and personalities, but also of current events. Dr. Andrei Sakharov's press conference of 3 June, held under official auspices, was unprecedented, even though the Soviet press failed to report his more critical comments. Some unofficial meetings of political activists have been allowed to take place in Moscow and other cities with close surveillance but little or no harassment. But other meetings of groups such as the "Democratic Union", which is seeking the introduction of a multi-party system, have been disrupted. Prominent activists such as Sergie Grigoryants (editor of the magazine "Glasnost") have been subjected to short-term detention and official criticism. Very few arrests of political activists on criminal charges have taken place although some 300 political prisoners, including several Helsinki monitors, are still serving sentences in camps and internal exile or are detained in mental hospitals.

Nationalist unrest in various parts of the Soviet union has become an increasing challenge to the authorities as ethnic minorities increasingly demand fair political treatment and protection of their linguistic and cultural rights. Some minor concessions have been made. For example, Crimean Tatars are now permitted to return to their homeland in a strictly controlled manner, but other major grievances and demands have not been fully addressed.

Emigration by Jews, Armenians and ethnic Germans continues to increase steadily. Jewish emigration has doubled as against the same period last year. The steady flow of long-standing Jewish refuseniks granted permission to emigrate has continued, for example, Natasha Khassina, the Rosensteins, Lev Furman, Vladimir Tufeld and, following the Moscow summit, the Zieman family. However, many others remain. The secrecy provision continues to be applied in an apparently arbitrary fashion.

Reform of the rules of criminal procedure has been announced but not yet introduced. However, the authorities have modified the rules governing confinement in psychiatric institutions, with effect from 1 January 1988. In addition, it is now a crime knowingly to commit a sane individual for psychiatric treatment. Responsibility for special psychiatric hospitals has been transferred from the Interior to the Health Ministry.

Changes are expected shortly to legislation concerning religion. Relations between the state and the Orthodox Church have improved, partly as a result of the celebrations of the millenium of the introduction of Christianity. Mr. Gorbachev met the Orthodox patriarch on 29 April and Papal representative Cardinal Casaroli at the millenium celebrations in June. In his address of 28 June to the 19th party conference he spoke of the need to respect believers. Nevertheless, the Ukrainian (Uniate) Catholic Church remains banned and official comments about it offer little hope for the future. Members of other unregistered religious denominations are still subject to harassment.

In Bulgaria human rights and amendments to legislation on citizenship, foreign travel and residence abroad were discussed at a session of the National Assembly Foreign Policy Commission in February. It appears that changes are envisaged to bring Bulgarian legislation more into line with international human rights obligations and CSCE commitments. In June an "independent" human rights commission was set up, but it is likely to remain under official control. Some human rights activists and religious believers have received permission to travel to the West but, on the whole, dissidents continue to be imprisoned or penalised for their views. Religious communities, other than the Orthodox Church, still have difficulties with the state. Bulgaria's treatment of the ethnic Turkish minority in particular flouts all aspects of principle VII. The practice of the Muslim religion is repressed, the use of the Turkish language banned, and contacts of westerners with ethnic Turks are heavily discouraged. It remains to be seen whether the bilateral Bulgarian-Turkish protocol signed on 23 February will lead to improved treatment of the Turkish minority.

In Czechoslovakia religious activists are still subject to harassment and arrest. The authorities have recently given permission for the appointment of three bishops to vacant sees but others remain unfilled. Several dissidents were arrested by the Czechoslovak police when trying to attend a British embassy dinner in March to meet a visiting senior Foreign and Commonwealth Office official. This was probably due to the coincidence of a religious festival scheduled for the same weekend. A demonstration for religious rights in Bratislava on 25 March was broken up by force by the police. A Charter 77 peace conference in June, attended by other East Europeans and westerners including British members of European Nuclear Disarmament (END), was broken up and all foreign participants ordered to leave the country. Charter 77 members have been harassed less than in the past, but the authorities continue to resort to imprisonment on political grounds. The dissident Pavel Wonka died in custody after his re-arrest (although an independent autopsy cleared the Czechoslovak authorities of foul play). Ivan Polansky was sentenced to four years' imprisonment for possessing samizdat literature (on wartime Fascist Slovakia). Another dissident Jiri Wolf remains in prison, despite appeals by us and other Western Governments for his release. On a more positive note, Karel Srp, chairman of the banned Jazz Section, was released, as was Ervin Motl of the Committee for the Defence of the Unjustly Prosecuted.

By comparison with its neighbours, Hungary's human rights record remains good, but not faultless. An estimated 150 to 200 Hungarians are serving sentences for refusing military service but legislation on alternative service is planned for later this year. In March eight people were detained by the police, one being physically assaulted, before a mass march to mark the anniversary of the 1848 uprising. All were later released. On 16 June about 20 people were arrested at a demonstration to mark the 30th anniversary of the execution of Imre Nagy. Some were beaten up, but all were released the same day. On 27 June about 40,000 people held a march, unhindered by the authorities, to protest against the destruction of villages in Romania.

Implementation of the Final Act by the German Democratic Republic remained unsatisfactory. Open signs of discontent among human rights activists increased markedly. In January, a number of unofficial demonstrators who had joined an official march were arrested. There were further detentions in February, mainly of people who had applied to emigrate to the West. As a result of the Church's mediatory efforts, strong protests and wide international media coverage, all those detained were later freed, though some opposition figures were pressured into emigrating immediately to the West. State/Church relations have shown signs of deterioration as a result of these incidents, for example, state censorship of Church publications has tightened. In June, the GDR police clashed with young people gathering near the Berlin wall to hear pop concerts in West Berlin and harassed Western journalists who were present.

Implementation by Poland of the human rights provisions of the Final Act remained patchy. A high degree of religious tolerance continued to be observed, but Church publications were still subject to state censorship. The Roman Catholic church is currently constructing a large number of new churches. Trade union pluralism is still banned. During industrial unrest in May (including a major strike in Gdansk) the authorities resorted to old-fashioned methods of dealing with political protest. But most of those arrested have since been released.

There has been no improvement over the last six months in Romania's appallingly bad implementation of its CSCE human rights commitments, and a marked deterioration in one respect. Romania is currently the biggest obstacle to progress in the Vienna CSCE negotiations.

Several prominent dissidents and critics of Government policy have been arrested or confined to their homes at times of high international media interest in Romania, for example, following the spontaneous demonstrations in Brasov by factory workers in November 1987 and during the party conference, to prevent contact between them and visiting Western journalists. Though released subsequently, their movements remain closely monitored.

Romania's policy of "systemisation" (the destruction of villages and the concentration of the population in urban-type settlements), which is to be speeded up, appears to involve forcible relocation and the loss of homes and lands. The cultural and linguistic rights of, and facilities for, ethnic minorities continue to be gradually eroded.

CONFIDENCE AND SECURITY BUILDING MEASURES

Warsaw pact states have been careful to fulfil their obligations under the 1986 Stockholm document and have generally complied with its spirit. In the last six months eleven notifiable Warsaw pact exercises have taken place. United Kingdom observers attended each of the three Warsaw pact exercises to which they were invited and we inspected a Soviet airborne exercise in the Odessa region in April, where there were no indications of any lack of compliance with the provisions of the Stockholm document. In April, the United States inspected a non-ratified Soviet military activity in the GDR, under relevant paragraphs (65 and 66) of the Stockholm document.

CO-OPERATION IN THE FIELD OF ECONOMICS, OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY AND OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Throughout the Warsaw pact there has been little progress in the field of economics co-operation. However, Soviet statistical publications have reinstated sections long omitted. The radical debate on economic reform in the Soviet Union has continued, but few concrete results have emerged from the reform measures so far introduced. Mr. Gorbachev, in his 28 June speech, called for accelerated transition to wholesale trading and emphasised the urgency of price and credit reform. He said that priority in foreign trade would continue to be given to Socialist countries but that he envisaged a fully convertible rouble at some stage. The continued move towards market principles and decentralisation in the Soviet economy, together with the present emphasis on light industry and the consumer, should increase opportunities for co-operation with Western countries. Approximately 40 joint ventures between foreign countries and the USSR have so far been established. Soviet shortages of hard currency will, however, remain a significant constraint.

Poland and Hungary remain the countries of most interest to Western businesses. Some 600 Polish businesses are expected to be given licences to deal directly with foreign companies. Recently introduced economic reforms have run into trouble, but the authorities seem determined to press ahead. Hungary's economic performance remains disappointing, although there have been signs of modest improvement. New legislation has been introduced enabling manufacturing enterprises to engage in hard currency trade activities. The number of joint ventures with Western companies increased to 120. In the other Warsaw pact states facilities for business men remained poor, with sparse commercial information, and hotels, accommodation and office space available only at charges well above normal rates.

There was little progress on environmental issues in the Warsaw pact states, but both Poland and Czechoslovakia have signed environmental agreements with non-pact countries. The Soviet Union created a State Committee for Environmental Protection, but it is too early to predict its effectiveness. There have been several demonstrations against gross atmospheric and water pollution. The Soviet press itself has indicated that the situation is alarming. Bulgaria hosted a Balkan environmental conference at the end of 1987 and plans a second one this year.

CO-OPERATION IN HUMANITARIAN AND OTHER FIELDS (BASKET III)

Restrictions on human contacts and freedom of movement are still in place in most countries. Contacts between Romanians and foreigners are not permitted without prior official authorisation and Western visitors' movements are carefully controlled. Despite increased emigration from the Soviet Union, refusals of permission to emigrate are still based too often and for far too long on grounds of access to state secrets. The requirement for parental consent or financial waiver has been maintained. Of equal concern is the apparent introduction of a policy whereby youths nearing conscription age must undertake military service before applying to emigrate (whereupon they become subject to the secrecy provision).

Nevertheless, some positive developments have been noted. New provisions for issue of multiple entry visas and faster issuing of ordinary visas for business men have been adopted in the Soviet Union. In Czechoslavakia more flexible regulations on travel to the West are in operation. Hungary has adopted new legislation on foreign travel entitling everyone (except those with a criminal record or for reasons of state security) to a passport and removing the requirement for exit visas. Exceptionally in Eastern Europe, Hungarians may now settle abroad without losing their citizenship and retaining the right to return at a later date. There has been a continued increase in private visits abroad from Poland, the GDR and the Soviet Union, though exit procedures are cumbersome and non-convertibility of currency remains a major practical barrier.

Family reunification cases involving United Kingdom citizens are outstanding in the Soviet Union (1), Czechoslovakia (5), GDR (9) and Romania (17). In Bulgaria family reunification cases involving ethnic Turks are a particular problem; of 163 children for whom exit visa applications were submitted, only 43 have been able to join their families in Turkey.

Actively encouraged by the Soviet Union, the information networks in most Eastern countries have had to adjust in some measure to glasnost. In the Soviet Union unprecedented public views have been expressed on a range of topics, especially the Stalinist past and the Soviet political structure. However, high level warnings have clearly indicated that even glasnost has its limits. The treatment of foreign correspondents is improving, with notable exceptions on political grounds, for example, news management because of nationalist unrest (in the Soviet Union). In most countries there is a more open attitude to controversial, social issues such as drugs, AIDS, alcohol abuse and environmental problems. With the exception of Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty, Deutsche Welle, Israel Radio, the Voice of Turkey and Vatican Radio (the latter two in Bulgaria), jamming of radio broadcasts has continued to decrease. The possibility of access to foreign films and programmes has grown in some countries but the availability of Western journals is still strictly limited.

CO-OPERATION AND EXCHANGES IN THE FIELD OF CULTURE AND EDUCATION

Cultural exchanges and contacts, educational agreements and more genuine contacts between scientists and technicians have increased in all East European countries except Romania. However, East European insistence on enforced reciprocity continues to affect certain areas of exchanges. Bulgaria is showing increased interest in English language teaching. But systematic attempts by Romania and Bulgaria to erode or suppress ethnic cultures continue to be matters of grave concern.

We are continuing our efforts to persuade the Soviet authorities to allow cultural contacts outside the established Ministry of Culture and Goskoncert channels, which are overloaded and often excessively slow and inefficient. By contrast, there is easy access in the United Kingdom to a wide range of non-Government entrepreneurs, local authorities, cultural organisations, etc for Soviet cultural events.

The National Theatre conducted a Soviet tour in May/June. While successful in artistic terms, this was severely inconvenienced by mismanagement and breaches of contract by the Soviet organisers. The BBC Wales symphony orchestra visited the Soviet Union in May. Successful meetings between film-makers, journalists, writers and lawyers took place in the period under review. A senior delegation of Soviet university pro-rectors visited the United Kingdom in February and direct exchanges between schoolchildren are under way. Soviet events in the United Kingdom in the period under review have included tours by the choir of the Moscow military district, the Moscow state circus and classical ballet, and the Maly theatre of Leningrad.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Privatisation)

5. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he is considering for the privatisation of British Rail.

Mr. Channon: I am considering all long-term options for the future of British Rail, and privatisation is one of the possibilities.

Speed Limits

10. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the Institute of Advanced Motorists proposing (a) a minimum speed limit and (b) an increase in the present maximum limit to 80 mph on motorways; what assessment he has made of the implications of such proposals for the safety of road transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: We keep closely in touch with the Institute of Advanced Motorists, whose advanced driving courses make a valuable contribution to road safety. I am therefore familiar with its views on motorway speed limits, but I have no plans to change our current policy.

"Reviving the Railways"

11. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to review his policy towards the funding of British Rail in the light of the report "Reviving the Railways" by the Centre for Policy Studies, a copy of which has been sent to him.

37. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take in the light of the Centre for Policy Studies document "Reviving the Railways" a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend is considering the long-term options for British Rail, including privatisation. Publications like the Centre for Policy Studies report are a useful contribution to the public debate.

Waterstock-Wendlebury Motorway

12. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received concerning the proposals to construct a two-lane motorway between Waterstock and Wendlebury.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Since the public inquiry ended in January, 43 letters from hon. Members and others.

Singapore (Air Services)

16. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to liberalise the current United Kingdom-Singapore air service agreement.

Mr. Channon: When United Kingdom and Singapore officials met late last month, it was agreed that possibilities for liberalising arrangements for United Kingdom-Singapore routes should be worked up and discussed at a further meeting later this year.

30. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department next plans to meet civil aviation officials from the Republic of Singapore to discuss air services between there and the United Kingdom.

38. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the results of the recent talks between officials in his Department and the Ministry of Communications in Singapore to discuss the provision of additional air services between London and Singapore.

39. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the results of the recent talks between officials in his Department and their counterparts in Singapore to discuss the provision of air services between Manchester and Singapore.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: United Kingdom and Singapore Civil Aviation officials met late last month when the Singapore authorities tabled proposals for liberalising arrangements for air services on the London-Singapore and Manchester-Singapore routes. These proposals are being examined and will be discussed at a further meeting with the Singapore authorities later this year.

41. Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the shortage of capacity on air routes between the United Kingdom and Singapore.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have received a number of representations about the level of capacity on the London-Singapore and Manchester-Singapore routes.

Ferry Safety

19. Mr. Allan Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to bring forward regulations affecting ferry safety.

Mr. Channon: I have already made six sets of regulations on loading door warning lights, TV monitoring equipment, emergency lighting, logging of door closures, listing of operating berths, and boarding cards. Regulations are being prepared on further ferry safety matters, and these will be brought forward once statutory consultation is complete.

Cross-Channel Ferries

22. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about staffing levels on cross-Channel ferries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I have received a number of representations on staffing levels on cross-Channel ferries.

Freight Facility Grants

23. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the results achieved since 1983 by the provision of freight facility grants.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since 1983 62 grants have been awarded for rail schemes, of which 47 have been in England, and there have been four inland waterway grants.

M1

Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the rate of progress of current road repairs to the M1 between Bedfordshire and London.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The major maintenance work being carried out is between junctions four and five in the London borough of Barnet. It involves the strengthening of the existing carriageway and the provision of a crawler lane on the southbound carriageway for heavy goods vehicles. Work is progressing well and will be completed in August, two months ahead of schedule.

Bridges

25. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to how many local authority-maintained road bridges are in need of repair.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The bridge census and sample survey of January 1987 identified some 50,000 bridges in Great Britain on local authority roads which were covered by the bridge assessment code for older short-span highway bridges (1984). The estimated number of these not meeting the standards of that code was about 11,000.

33. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated cost of repairing all of his Department's maintained bridges.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We estimate that about £50 million a year is needed for ongoing maintenance required to keep pace with deterioration. In addition we announced in November 1987 a programme of assessment and strengthening of some older bridges, and of upgrading certain bridges to higher standards.

42. Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated cost of repairing all local authority-maintained bridges.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The bridge census and sample survey estimated that the cost of strengthening to the 1984 standard the 11,000 older short span highway bridges in Great Britain on roads which are the responsibility of local highway authorities could be some £700 million.

Commuter Services

26. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect on the provision of commuter services by British Rail of his decision to make InterCity ineligible for public service obligation grant from 1 April.

Mr. David Mitchell: There is no good reason why commuters using InterCity's fast long-distance services should be subsidised. Service provision of InterCity trains at peak hours will continue to match demand as closely as possible.

Most commuter services into London, including all services on the Chiltern lines, are operated by Network SouthEast and are unaffected by the change.

Children (Car Safety)

27. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further proposals he is considering to improve the safety of children in cars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No responsible parent would wait for the law before fitting and using child restraints. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) is to be congratulated on bringing on to the statute book legislation providing for the compulsory restraint of children travelling in the rear of cars. We shall begin drawing up regulations and consult widely in doing so.

Channel Tunnel (Customs Clearance)

28. Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has made a financial assessment of the impact on British Rail of disallowing the use of non-train Customs clearance for trains using the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: Section 12 of the Channel Tunnel Act requires on-train controls to be provided on services to and from destinations to the north of London, on condition that British Rail provides acceptable facilities. Discussions are in progress between British Rail and the frontier control authorities. It is for British Rail to make any necessary financial assessments of the impact on it.

Heathrow (Access Routes)

29. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report on new access routes between Heathrow and central London.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am now considering the report and hope to make an announcement shortly.

Motorway Speed Limits

31. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the proportion of cars which exceed the 70 mph speed limit on motorways.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A national speed survey carried out in 1987 showed that 36 per cent. of cars exceeded the 70 mph limit. In 1983 the figure was 40 per cent.

The average speed over the same period has dropped from 68 mph to 65 mph.

North Report

32. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received following the publication of the North report on road traffic law.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on Tuesday 5 July 1988 at columns 583-84.

Roads (Devon)

34. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the north Devon link road between Tiverton and South Molton to be open for use; and if he will make a statement on progress of the link road, Barnstaple bypass and Barnstaple relief road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The contractor is making excellent progress and hopes to complete this autumn although it is to soon to forecast a date. The contract for the section of the south Devon link road between Tiverton and South Molton is due for completion in the middle of next year.

The remaining section of the link road, between south Molton and Barnstaple, and the Barnstaple bypass remain on target for completion in the middle of 1989.

The Barnstaple urban relief road is a Devon county council scheme. We understand it expects to complete stage 3, currently under construction, early in the new year.

Traffic Flows

35. Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to improve the flow of traffic both on motorways and in city centres.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our road programme includes 28 improvement schemes designed to improve the flow of traffic on motorways. The majority of these are junction improvements and widening schemes on existing motorways.

There are over 160 bypasses in the road programme some of which are designed to relieve traffic in city centres. Many other schemes also have a bypassing effect.

Roads in city centres are usually the responsibility of local highway authorities. We continue researching into improved methods of traffic management and driver guidance.

British Rail (Customs Clearance)

36. Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail to discuss on-train Customs clearance.

Mr. David Mitchell: On 28 March.

Integrated Ticketing

40. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will initiate discussions between the various relevant groups in the Greater London area including the operators and the consultative bodies representing passengers, on the future development of integrated ticketing covering various transport modes.

Mr. David Mitchell: London Regional Transport has recently conducted a wide-ranging consultative exercise on its future strategy, including ticketing. The outcome was reflected in its new statement of strategy published on 23 June. The Department has no plans to mount a separate consultative exercise at this stage.

London Regional Transport

43. Sir John Biggs-Davison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of London Regional Transport, he will discuss the safety and comfort of passengers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: These matters are the responsibility of the board of LRT although the chairman keeps my right hon. Friend and me informed of major developments. In particular, we receive regular bulletins on service quality and I have asked the chairman to put forward proposals for service quality objectives comparable to those already established for British Rail.

53. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to meet the chairman of the London Regional Transport authority.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend and I expect to meet the chairman of London Regional Transport at a meeting of the London Passenger Transport Group on 12 July.

56. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has recently met the senior management of London Regional Transport to discuss safety standards.

Mr. David Mitchell: The board of London Regional Transport is statutorily responsible for safety; but it keeps my right hon. Friend informed.

58. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the senior management of London Regional Transport; and what subjects where discussed.

Mr. David Mitchell: I met the board of London Regional Transport on 5 May to discuss issues of current concern.

King's Cross Inquiry

44. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of Mr. Desmond Fennell, QC chairman of the King's Cross inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Mr. Fennell has said that he hopes his report will be completed in the autumn.

British Rail Engineering Ltd

45. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about progress towards denationalisation of British Rail Engineering Ltd.

Mr. David Mitchell: The railways board is proceeding with preparations for the sale of BREL. I understand that the board aims to invite offers for the company within the next few weeks.

Bus Fares

46. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the average percentage increase in the fares of urban and rural bus services in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales, for each year since 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Department does not collect separate data for urban and rural bus services. Relative to an index of 100 in 1980, local bus fares in England, Scotland and Wales were:

Year	England	Scotland	Wales
1980	100·0	100·0	100·0
1981	112·0	115·1	118·8
1982	127·1	129·2	132·4
1983	133·5	137·3	144·7
1984	135·8	142·5	155·7
1985	142·6	144·7	160·6
1986	156·2	148·2	166·6
1987	164·7	151·9	171·1

Data by type of operator are published in table 2.35 of the Department of Transport's "Statistics Bulletin 88(29)", a copy of which is in the Library.

Settle-Carlisle Railway

47. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received against closure of the Settle-Carlisle section of British Rail since his announcement of 16 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend and I have received over 500 representations. My right hon. Friend's view remains as announced to the House on 16 May.

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is yet in a position to give the name and address to use for the British Rail official whom the board is to appoint as project officer for its disposal of the Settle to Carlisle railway line.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am pleased to say that the British Railways board has now appointed Mr. Chris Lewin as its project manager to co-ordinate private sector proposals for the line. He is being assisted by Mr. Michael Roberts of Lazard Brothers & Co. Ltd., of 21 Moorfields, London EC2 (Tel. 01 588 2721).

All private firms and individuals who may be interested in bidding for the line should contact Mr. Roberts in the first instance. He will arrange for them to receive a brochure setting out key information about the line. The brochure is expected to be available at the end of July.

Violent Crime (London)

48. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many prosecutions for violence against the person and robbery were initiated by (a) London Transport and (b) London Underground in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Transport police are responsible for initiating prosecutions against offenders on the London Underground. Figures for the number of prosecutions for violence against the person and robbery are not available, but details of reported cases and clear-up rates for these crimes over the last five years are as follows:

	Cases	Clear-ups	Per cent. clear-up rate
Violence against the person
1983	599	237	39·6
1984	608	160	26·3
1985	686	213	31·9
1986	878	266	30·3
1987	929	293	31·5
Robbery
1983	361	27	7·5
1984	606	20	3·3
1985	714	51	7·1
1986	685	148	21·6
1987	883	88	9·9

Air Travel

49. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to seek to achieve true competition in air travel within the European Community.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The EC liberalisation package, agreed by the Council last December as a first step for aviation towards completion of the single market measure in 1992, is based largely on a United Kingdom Presidency initiative and contains measures fully applying the competition rules of the treaty of Rome to air transport.

The package commits the Council to agreement on the contents of a second step by June 1990. In the meantime, our aim is to seek to persuade those member states who have not already done so to agree more liberal arrangements with us bilaterally.

Ro-ro Ferries

50. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with International Maritime Organisation members concerning ro-ro ferry stability.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend addressed the fifteenth session of the assembly of the International Maritime Organisation on 9 November last year when he impressed on representatives the United Kingdom Government's concern to secure early international agreement on measures to ensure the highest safety standards for roll-on roll-off ferries. The maritime safety committee at its April meeting considered and endorsed new damage stability requirements for passenger ships, as explained in the answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 19 May, Official Report, columns 524-25.

M5

51. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement with respect to access to the M5 motorway at junction 12.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to be able to make a decision on the proposed additional slip roads during the course of the summer.

Oxford-London Train Services

54. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has received from British Rail for investment to improve train services between Oxford and London.

Mr. David Mitchell: None, as yet but I understand that British Rail has long-term plans to introduce new rolling stock on this line.

British Rail (Service Quality)

55. Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects British Rail to achieve its quality of service standards.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have asked the board to work towards the achievement of the agreed quality objectives as soon as is practicable. Many individual routes are already meeting the objectives.

London Underground (Pest Control)

57. Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on pest control in the London Underground system.

Mr. Mitchell: No. Pest control is an operational matter for the boards and managements of London Regional Transport and London Underground Limited.

Motorway Driving

59. Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action is being taken to improve driving skills and behaviour on motorways.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on 19 April at column 407.

Road Haulage

60. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when full liberalisation of European road haulage will be achieved.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Quotas and permits will be abolished from 1 January 1993 within the Community. Agreement on this at the June Council of Ministers was a significant achievement. The conditions under which road haulage cabotage will take place are under discussion.

We aim to extend liberalisation to other countries with which we have road haulage agreements.

Driving Licences

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the male-female distribution of driving licences currently issued by the driver and vehicle licensing centre, by age category.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The male/female distribution of driving licences issued by the driver and vehicle licensing centre by age category are:

Age	Males	Percent.	Females	Percent.	Total
16–20	1,490,517	56	1,185.709	44	2,676,226
21–25	2,139,296	54	1,815,941	46	3,955,237
26–30	2,029,371	55	1,673,119	45	3,702,490
31–40	3,749,589	55	3,024,668	45	6,774,257
41–50	3,312,196	58	2,390,646	42	5,702,842
51–60	2,676,315	64	1,527,942	36	4,204,257
61–70	2,274,498	70	966,740	30	3,241,238
71+	1,068,383	74	378,599	26	1,446,982
Total	18,740,165	59	12,963,364	41	31,703,529

Of the 4,449,705 provisional licences, 1,818,009 are issued to males, 2,631,696 to females.

Road Accidents

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's assessment of the link between the incidence and severity of road accidents and the speed at which the vehicles involved have been travelling.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The severity of road accidents, particularly those involving pedestrians, is related to the speed of impact—which is not necessarily the speed of travel. The table indicates that fatality rates are higher on high speed roads.

Accidents and casualties: by severity, major and minor roads and speed limit: 1986

	Number of accidents				Number of casualties
	Fatal	Serious	Slight	All severities	Fatal	Seriously injured	Slightly injured	All severities
Major roads[1]
Speed limit
30 mph	959	14,475	56,338	71,772	993	15,881	70,067	86,941

[1] Motorways and A roads.
[2] Includes unknown speed limits.
[3] B, C and unclassified roads.
[4] Includes unknown road class.

The relationship between speed and the number of accidents is unclear. Other aspects of driver behaviour may be of greater significance.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the regions involved in section 40 discussions concerning the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Rail that its discussions embrace every region of the United Kingdom.

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated cost to public funds, for each of the last five years, of motor accidents where excess alcohol consumption was the principal cause.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is not available in the specified format. Estimates are made of costs of road accidents under five headings, and are given in the table. These are total costs, for all accidents, including damage-only accidents, in Great Britain.

Estimated costs of road accidents: Great Britain: 1986

Lost output	860
Medical and ambulance costs	150
Police and insurance administration	160
Damage to property	1,170
Pain, grief and suffering	1,470
Total	3,800

The costs per accident, by severity, are also estimated, as follows.

Average cost per accident by severity: Great Britain: 1986

	Fatal	Serious	Slight
Lost output	151,203	1,1982	28
Medical and ambulance costs	1,174	2,069	105
Police and insurance administration	347	277	208
Damage to property	1,982	1,568	1,116
Pain, grief and suffering	145,134	12,287	229
Total	299,840	18,182	1,686

Reverse in Safety Campaign

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from the reverse in safety campaign; what has been his response; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are aware of the campaign. I have received a request for a meeting with the organisers. Regulations leave operators free to choose whether to fit reversing alarms to their vehicles or not. When the regulations were formulated we believe we struck a good balance between the possible safety benefits and the potential noise nuisance.

Reversing alarms are an aid to safety. It would be misleading and dangerous to place complete reliance on them. When a driver reverses, it is his sole responsibility to ensure that it is safe to do so and that there are no obstructions and no people, who might be deaf or disabled, in the way. That is the advice given in the Highway Code. The vast majority of drivers of all classes of vehicle follow it. As a result the number of fatalities and serious injuries caused by vehicles being driven in reverse gear is very small.

The current regulations were made in 1985 following wide consultation about the draft. There is no evidence of a serious problem. I do not think a meeting is necessary at the moment.

Woolwich Ferry

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied that the Woolwich ferry will now be able to provide a regular and reliable service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The ferry has been operating normally since 11 April. We hope that new working arrangements arising from the management review of the ferry can be fully implemented in the near future. A reliable and cost-effective service should then be maintained.

Cycle Routes

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration is being given by his Department to the provision of strategic cycle routes in London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Most cycling in London is done on roads for which the boroughs are highway authorities. It is primarily for them to decide what facilities to provide for cyclists, in the light of local circumstances.

The Department encourages local highway authorities in London and elsewhere to give consideration to the needs of cyclists, both in the design of new road schemes and on existing roads.

Proposals for cycle routes that cross London borough boundaries can be considered either by the individual boroughs concerned, or in the London cycling forum, which contains representatives from all the London boroughs.

A27 (Arundel Bypass)

Mr. Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will outline the economic implications of building the Crossbush section of the A27 Arundel bypass in advance of the rest of the scheme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The net present value of building the Crossbush section in advance is:

	£ million
Low growth	1·58
High growth	6·24

London Underground (Fires)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any proposals to change the criteria by which fires on the London Underground are considered to be serious enough to warrant recording.

Mr. David Mitchell: At this time there are no proposals to change the criteria for the reporting of fires on London Underground. Careful consideration will, of course, be given to any recommendations made by the King's Cross accident inquiry.

A27

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether, given no decision has been taken on any future route for the A27, leaflets regarding compensation for the purchase of property affected by any development of the A27 have been sent to householders on all possible routes described in the consultant's report or only to those living on the route recommended by the consultant.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Booklets about compensation are sent out by the Department in response to individual requests from the public. Copies were available at the exhibitions held by the consultants to explain their report.

Motorways (Capacity)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the maximum capacity of an existing three-lane motorway without delays in the overtaking lane under (a) present driving patterns, (b) an enforced 70 mph speed limit and (c) an enforced 70 mph speed limit with gaps between vehicles, as recommended in dry conditions, being observed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The maximum capacity of any road will vary with the vehicle mix, road layout, time of day, time of year and driving conditions.

The Department produces guidelines on carriageway standards in relation to traffic flows only for the purpose of establishing which options should be appraised. As a starting point for assessment, dual three-lane standard will be considered for a rural motorway if the forecast average annual daily traffic flow in the design year, 15 years after the road opens, is in the range 50,000–79,000 vehicles. The design flow for any road is less than its maximum capacity.

Members' Staff

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Lord President of the Council what guidance is given to right hon. and hon. Members as to their statutory responsibility in respect of staff employed by them.

Mr. Wakeham: The Fees Office has responsibilities for guidance to Members in respect of statutory obligations to their staff. Guidance is given by means of personal advice, circulars on relevant topics and, recently, by the provision of a draft statement of the main terms and conditions of employment together with a completed set of guidance notes. These notes include details of employees' statutory rights and entitlements.

Members have also been issued with a copy of the Fees Office handbook "Parliamentary Salaries, Allowances and Pensions", which includes advice on their statutory obligations to their staff in relation to income tax and national insurance.

An advisory service on questions of employment legislation is maintained with the close support of ACAS. In addition ACAS offers assistance on a wide range of employment issues, and various publications are available in the Fees Office on request.

PRIME MINISTER

Manufacturing Industry

Q100. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise the issue of the United Kingdom's trade balance in manufactured goods with the European Economic Community at the next meeting of the European Council; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. I have nothing to add to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 17 May at column 367.

New Zealand (Food Exports)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if she has conveyed or will convey her comments in the House on 19 May, Official Report, column 1087-88, in regard to New Zealand's food exports to the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community Commission before any proposals are made by the Commission on New Zealand's butter exports to the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will ensure that the Government's views on this issue are communicated to the European Commission at the appropriate time.

Belize

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the future of British involvement in Belize; and if any plans exist to reduce that involvement, with specific reference to any planned transfer of responsibilities to any third Government.

The Prime Minister: The British garrison is in Belize at the request of the Belize Government to assist in external defence and the training of the Belize defence force. It will remain for an appropriate period. There are no plans to transfer this responsibility to any third Government.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was present at Victoria station to mark the arrival of the President of Turkey. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I will be attending a state banquet in honour of President Evren.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Whisky

Mr. Watts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with (a) the Scotch whisky industry and (b) his European Community counterparts on the taxation of whisky.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend received various representations from the Scotch whisky industry in the run-up to his annual Budget. My right hon. Friend meets his European Community counterparts from time to time to discuss a variety of subjects.

Meat and Livestock Commission

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will apply section 20 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983 to the Meat and Livestock Commission to allow it to reclaim value added tax on non-business expenditure.

Mr. Lilley: No. The Meat and Livestock Commission is not a body to which it would be appropriate to apply section 20 treatment. However, I have agreed to meet the chairman of the Meat and Livestock Commission to discuss the impact on his members of the recent court ruling about reclaiming VAT on non-business expenditure.

Apple and Pear Development Corporation

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will apply section 20 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983 to the Apple and Pear Development Corporation to allow it to reclaim value added tax on non-business expenditure.

Mr. Lilley: The Apple and Pear Development Council is not a body to which it would be appropriate to apply section 20 treatment. However, I have agreed to meet representatives of the agricultural levy-funded bodies to discuss the impact on them of the recent court ruling about reclaiming VAT on non-business expenditure.

Domestic Investment

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of recent interest rate adjustments on the level of domestic investment.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor estimated, at the time of his Budget, that business investment would grow by 9 per cent. in 1988.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the cost to the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Brooke: The relevant cost was as follows:

Financial year	£
1983-84	2,655,187
1984-85	4,843,278
1985-86	5,418,927
1986-87	4,839,535
[1]1987-88	5,979,487

[1] Provisional.

VAT

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has made to the French Government about the implications for the Channel tunnel of the costs of value added tax on the French portion of the project.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 4 July 1988]: The effects of VAT on the construction of the Channel tunnel were considered jointly by the United Kingdom and French authorities at the planning stage. Special provisions were considered unnecessary.

THE ARTS

Works of Art in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he anticipates any call in the near future on the Contingency Reserve for a work of art offered in lieu of capital transfer tax.

Mr. Luce: I am very pleased to be able to announce that heritage Ministers have accepted in principle two paintings by William Hogarth. The formal exchange of memoranda will complete the acceptance in the near future. The amount of tax satisfied will be in the region of £1·3 million. This will be met by a call on the reserve.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Tests (Compensation)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the implications for his Department's policy towards compensating service men for the alleged effects of radioactivity suffered during the nuclear tests in the 1950s of the letter, dated 20 September 1951, sent by Rear-Admiral Turlesse of the trials metering section at the Admiralty to Vice-Admiral Brooking of the armament research establishment at the Ministry of Defence, stating with regard to the hurricane tests that (a) some degree of risk had to be run by some people if the Government were to achieve the full purpose of the trial, (b) all Government servants were entitled to compensation for injury on duty and (c) the ill-effects from the tests may be long delayed.

Mr. Sainsbury: The letter to which the hon. Member refers from the naval commander of Operation Hurricane, written more than a year before the first United Kingdom test at Monte Bello, exemplifies what those planning the whole operation had long recognised, namely, the need to control exposure to ionising radiation so that no one should suffer harm. The resulting system of radiological control applied with only minor modifications throughout the whole United Kingdom atmospheric trials programme at Monte Bello, Maralinga and at Christmas Island. It was based on advice from the Medical Research Council and its main provisions are closely comparable with the radiological protection regulations which apply today throughout the nuclear industry. I am confident that it was wholly effective.

The radiation protection standards, both at Hurricane and later, catered specifically for Rear Admiral Torlesse's concern that to achieve the full purpose of the trial some personnel might experience higher exposure and hence correspondingly higher risk. The risk, though higher, was still very small indeed. The regulations required all such operations to be specially authorised by a senior officer for the small number of personnel who were concerned.

It is acknowledged that illnesses caused by exposure to radiation may be long delayed and that they are often indistinguishable from illnesses which occur in people not known to have been exposed. These features of radiation-related illnesses are among the reasons for commissioning the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) study of the health of United Kingdom test participants which confirmed that the chance of anyone suffering harm to health was extremely small. The NRPB study, which analysed mortality data up to end of 1983 and included participants who experienced significant exposure, did not show an association between radiation related diseases and exposure to radiation. The provisions of the war pensions arrangements administered by the Department of Health and Social Security exist to provide compensation in cases where "reliable evidence of reasonable doubt that harm is attributable to Service", can be shown. Furthermore, in answer to the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes), I stated that "if there were definite evidence linking the ill health of participants to their participation in the tests, we would of course be coming forward with offers of compensation". —[Official Report, 28 June 1988; Vol 136, c. 188.]

NATO (Infrastructure Contracts)

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures he is taking to assist British companies in securing North Atlantic Treaty Organisation infrastructure contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Assistance to United Kingdom companies in securing NATO infrastructure projects is provided by the Ministry of Defence for electronics projects and by the Department of the Environment for civil works projects. The address of the MOD contact point is given in each issue of the "Defence Contracts Bulletin". There is also a free booklet "Infrastructure Guide to Defence Contractors", which sets out infrastructure procedures in detail.

F14 Fighters

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has as to (a) what missiles are known to be carried by Iranian F14 fighters in the Persian Gulf, (b) how such missiles would be fired and (c) at what speed and level these aircraft would normally be flying in the course of an attack; and what would be their angle of descent;

(2) what information he has as to the maximum speed of an F14 fighter armed for attack on a naval vessel.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It would not be in the interests of the safety of our ships to reveal details of intelligence of the equipment and tactics which might be employed in attacks on shipping in the Gulf.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to whether Iranian F14 fighters are stationed at Bandar Abbas airport.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Bandar Abbas is both a civil and military airport. It is common knowledge that there are F14 aircraft stationed there.

Royal Navy (Aircraft Identification)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what range and at what height the Royal Navy ships operating in the strait of Hormuz are able to identify aircraft leaving the airports at Bandar Abbas, Shajah and Dubai.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 6 July, at column 646.

Civil Airliners (Persian Gulf)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's ships patrolling in the Persian Gulf are aware of the timing and routes of scheduled flights by civilian airliners in the region.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes.

Iranian Airliner

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Government will instruct the Royal Navy to co-operate with the Iranian authorities to help recover the black box of the aircraft shot down by the United States to enable the flight path to be established beyond all reasonable doubt.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Any such request from the Iranian authorities would be carefully considered.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether ships of the Royal Navy have helped to recover bodies from the Iranian airliner shot down by the United States Navy.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No Royal Navy ships were in the immediate vicinity and no requests for assistance were received from the Iranian authorities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will ask the commanders of Her Majesty's ships operating in the Persian Gulf and the strait of Hormuz for their records of the flight path taken by the Iranian airbus on leaving Bandar Abbas airport, their interpretations of its movements and the identity that they gave to it; whether he intends to provide that information to the United States Government; and if he will publish it in the Official Report.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave on 11 July, at column 4.

Belize

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if his Department has any plans for joint military operations or training exercises in Belize with any military power other than that of Belize; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if any joint military operations or training exercises have been carried out in Belize with foreign Governments other than that of Belize; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No such operations or exercises have taken place, and the Ministry of Defence has no plans to hold any.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Licensed Trade (Competition)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the progress of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's investigation into competition in the licensed trade.

Mr. Maude: The Secretary of State announced today that he had granted the Commission an extension of up to six months for this investigation, until 3 February 1989.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Sentencing Policy

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Lord Chancellor has any proposals to eradicate any disparities in the sentencing of black and white defendants; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: It is not for the Lord Chancellor or any other Minister to intervene in the sentencing of individual defendants. Sentencing in every case, except where mandatory sentences are provided by statute, is a matter of judicial discretion, in the light of the circumstances of each particular case and bearing in mind any guidelines which may have been laid down by the appellate courts. It is open to each convicted defendant to appeal against the sentence passed by the court if he or she is aggrieved by it.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Attorney-General how many representations the Lord Chancellor has received concerning current disparities in sentencing policy between black and white defendants, as outlined in the recent report by the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, a copy of which has been sent to him.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor has received no representations from organisations other than the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, nor from individual members of the public, concerning the sentencing of black defendants. He is, however, meeting representatives of NACRO shortly to discuss its concerns on this and other issues outlined in NACRO's recent report.

Judicial Studies Board

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Attorney-General how many black members have been appointed to the Judicial Studies Board.

The Attorney-General: No black members have been appointed to the Judicial Studies Board.

Judiciary (Training)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Attorney-General what measures exist in relation to the training of the judiciary prior to appointment or during tenure of office which ensure that sentencing reflects fully the multicultural nature of society; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: On appointment and at regular intervals during their careers, members of the judiciary attend training seminars. Sentencing exercises form part of this training, during which the principles of sentencing are explored. These principles require the sentencer to take into account the nature of the offence, the circumstances of the offender and any relevant judicial authority. The cultural background of the offender may well be a significant factor to be considered.

Herald of Free Enterprise

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Attorney-General (1) how many prosecutions have been brought in relation to events surrounding the capsize of the Herald of Free Enterprise in 1987; how many prosecutions are presently being considered by his Department in relation to events surrounding the capsize of the ferry; and if he will explain the delays in bringing forward any such prosecutions;

(2) what information he has as to how many (a) criminal charges have been brought and (b) convictions have been secured against individuals in relation to events surrounding the capsize of the Herald of Free Enterprise in 1987; and if he will explain any delays in bringing forward such charges.

The Attorney-General: Police inquiries were instituted in November, 1987, after the coroner's jury returned a verdict of unlawful killing. The inquiries are, of necessity, complex and extensive. A preliminary report was received from the police in June, and is now being considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions and Counsel. Counsel will advise as to any further inquiries that may be required. No criminal proceedings have as yet been instituted.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is Her Majesty's Government policy on on-train passport controls following the opening of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Renton: For Eurotunnel shuttle train journeys beginning or ending at Cheriton, static inward and outward controls are planned at Fréthun and Cheriton respectively. For journeys beginning or ending in London, the Government's view remains that the most convenient and practicable option is a quick and effective static control at Waterloo. For trains proceeding beyond London, the Channel Tunnel Act provides for immigration controls to be carried out on-train, subject to the provision of satisifactory facilities on those trains and to the payment of any fees or charges that may be imposed. Discussions with British Rail and Eurotunnel are continuing.

Cab Drivers (Assaults)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidelines to taxi and mini-cab drivers on safety precautions to deal with situations involving assault; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no present plans to do so. The taxi trade has been invited to take part in the deliberations of a Department of Transport standing committee which is considering the problem of violence towards road transport staff.

Vehicle Registration

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the police to establish a more satisfactory method of vehicle registration; and what consideration is being given to a lifetime personal registration plate.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received no representations from the police that the current vehicle registration system should be altered. Any proposal for a change in that system would in the first instance be for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to consider.

Alcohol Purchases (Identity Cards)

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will seek to introduce a system of photographic identity cards to be issued to all who desire to purchase alcohol from public houses, off-licences or supermarkets.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have at present no plans to introduce such a scheme nationally but welcome, and are watching with interest the effect of, the introduction of local voluntary identity card schemes by local licensees or licensed victuallers associations with the co-operation of the police.

Prison Visits

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department will have supplies of pre-paid envelopes for claims for help with prison visits.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are no plans to issue pre-paid envelopes: the assisted prison visits unit, when making payment to successful claimants, already adds 18p to cover postal costs.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers have undergone prolonged detention for each year since 1986; and what were their nationalities.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 4 June 1988]: The information readily available and shown in table A gives the numbers of asylum applicants at the ports who, on the first day of each month since January 1987, had been detained for more than one month. They are listed by the principal nationalities involved. Monthly numbers include detainees carried forward from previous months. On 1 June 1988, 66 persons who had sought asylum at ports were in detention. Their nationalities are shown in table B and the periods they had been detained in table C.

Students (Finance)

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the report of the review of student financial support.

Mr. Jackson: The Government will publish their proposals for the future of student support when they are ready to do so.

Special Needs

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives of disability organisations to discuss the provision of education for pupils with special needs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend met representatives of MENCAP in January 1987. As the Minister with specific responsibilities for special education in schools, I meet representatives of disability organisations frequently.

University of Wales

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives of the university of Wales; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Jackson: On 29 January 1987, when matters relating to the funding of the university were discussed.

Tourism Courses

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he proposes to take to up-date courses currently offered by colleges of further education and universities related to the tourist industry.

Mr. Jackson: It is for institutions of further and higher education, in consultation with accrediting bodies where appropriate, to determine the content of courses. One aim of the current reforms is to make the educational system at all levels more responsive to the needs of all sectors of the economy, including tourism.

Many colleges are working closely with the tourism industry, for example through advisory groups and industrial fellows, to help keep their courses up to date. This work is complemented by the Department's PICKUP (professional, industrial and commercial updating) programme.

Pictures (Royal Holloway College)

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to prevent the sale of all or part of the collection of British pictures from Royal Holloway college; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: No. This is a matter for the college authorities.

Polytechnics and Colleges

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish draft guidance and model articles of government for institutions in the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council sector; what bodies and organisations have been consulted before publication; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have today issued draft guidance including model articles of government for institutions which will form the PCFC funding sector, as proposed in the Education Reform Bill. The draft guidance, including model articles, is being issued now in order to give those concerned an opportunity to comment and to help institutions prepare for the introduction of the new arrangements. Comments have been requested by 16 September. Copies of the texts have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

In preparing the draft, officials had discussions with the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics and the Standing Conference of Principals.

Drinking Water

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools in England and Wales provide systematic information or teaching about (a) water fluoridation and (b) other aspects related to the purity of drinking water and its effect on the health of people.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not collected by my Department or by the Education Department of the Welsh Office.

University College, Wales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what special measures he will take to ensure that University college, north Wales, avoids insolvency and receives sufficient block grant to meet its existing commitments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The UGC monitors the academic and financial plans of all the university institutions it funds. As appropriate, University college, north Wales will be eligible for assistance from the committee's special three-year £250 million restructuring programme.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the block grant received by University college, north Wales, in real terms, for each of the years since 1978-79; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The information is as follows. These payments of recurrent grant to individual universities are made on the advice of the University Grants Committee.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish the annual report of Her Majesty's inspectors on local education authority provision for education and the quality of response in schools and colleges in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves) on 23 October 1987, at column 907, and to the reply which my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) gave to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) on 17 May at column 792. I hope to publish the next annual report in January 1989, which will cover the whole of the 1987-88 academic year rather than just one term.

WALES

Minerals Planning

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he has the power to impose on a mineral planning authority a programme of proposed sites if that authority refuses to agree one with British Coal Corporation;

(2) if mineral planning authorities were obliged to agree with British Coal a programme of proposed sites for opencast coal extraction, as suggested in "Minerals Planning Guidance 3".

Mr. Grist: The Government's recently issued advice in "Minerals Planning Guidance 3" on planning control over opencast mining recommends the industry to discuss with the mineral planning authorities plans for future opencasting in their areas. There is no power to require an authority to agree long-term plans or impose a programme of sites on them. However, we do consider that negotiations between authorities and both British Coal and private operators on possible future working can help facilitate the consideration of opencast coal planning applications.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will accept as a sound planning basis for an appeal against refusal by a mineral planning authority to grant permission for an opencast coal development, the refusal of that authority to agree a programme of proposed sites with British Coal Corporation;

(2) if the inclusion of a site within a programme of proposed sites in paragraph 20 of "Minerals Planning Guidance 3: Opencast Coal Mining" is material consideration to be taken into account by mineral planning authorities when deciding an individual application for that site.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to paragraph 22 of "Minerals Planning Guidance 3" which advises that where programmes have been agreed the Secretary of State will have regard to them in approving development plans and deciding opencast appeals. I must stress, however, that while such programmes would provide helpful indications of where opencasting might be acceptable, they have no statutory basis, and the existence or otherwise of a programme would be one of the factors to be taken into account when determining an application or an appeal.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if, in the light of paragraph 19 of "Minerals Planning Guidance 3", a mineral planning authority may deem it appropriate to draw up a policy of no development or of very limited developments on the basis of strong or overwhelming local opposition;

(2) whether, in the light of the statement in paragraph 19 of "Mineral Planning Guidance 3" that where appropriate mineral planning authorities should draw up policies for opencast coal mining in their area, an authority may deem it inappropriate to do so on the basis of strong or overwhelming local opposition to that development.

Mr. Grist: Mineral planning authorities are advised to draw up appropriate development plan policies for mineral working and the content of these should follow the advice in MPG 1 and 3. When approving structure plan policies, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should have regard to all relevant considerations, including any representations and objections received.

Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to increase the provision of housing in rural Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: We are encouraging local authorities in rural areas to use their considerable powers to provide homes for local people. Dwyfor district council has received additional allocations for this purpose totalling £0·5 million over the last three years. In addition, in approving the Housing Corporation's development programme, we have asked it to invest at least 25 per cent. of its increased allocation of £60 million in rural areas. Officials are discussing with the corporation and Mid Wales Development ways in which they can harness private finance to further increase the number of projects to provide housing for rent and low-cost home ownership schemes.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to increase the provision of housing in Mid Wales in relation to incoming industrial projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Mid Wales Development has its own programme to provide key worker housing to help attract incoming investment to its area and is considering ways it can use private finance to encourage additional provision. Mid Wales Development also has an agreement with the Housing Corporation for housing associations to provide a further 30 key worker houses per annum throughout its area.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of council and Mid Wales Development area houses completed for each of the years from 1979 to 1987 and the number of house starts in 1988-89 in the Mid Wales development area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Details of completions by local authorities and Mid Wales Development for the years 1979-1986 are published in "Local Housing Statistics," copies of which are available in the Library of the House. The figures for 1987 in the Mid Wales Development area are given in the following table. Figues for housing starts in 1988-89 are not yet available.

SCOTLAND

Quangos and Trading Funds

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all quasi-autonomous non-government organisations and trading funds reporting to his Department.

Mr. Rifkind: The bodies which report to my Department are listed in "Public Bodies—1987", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

None of my Department's activities is organised as a trading fund.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now make it his policy to list in the Official Report all the sites in Scotland identified by Nirex as suitable for nuclear waste disposal and storage.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. We are still awaiting a report by Nirex on sites worthy of further investigation, and this is not expected until early next year.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by region and district the area of land designated as of outstanding natural beauty up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The designation "area of outstanding natural beauty" does not apply in Scotland. Since 1980, 1,017,300 hectares have been designated as national scenic areas. A breakdown by district is not readily available but following is information by region:

Regional or Islands Council area	Hectares
Shetland	15,600
Orkney	14,800
Highland	539,600
Western Isles	115,600
Grampian	62,000
Tayside	77,200
Strathclyde	137,000
Central	19,800
Borders	15,900
Dumfries and Galloway	19,800

Before 1980 special arrangements to protect the landscape applied in national park direction areas, which covered an area of 485,150 hectares, mostly in HIghland region.

Easterhouse Citizens Advice Bureau

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the reasons for the refusal of urban aid support to the Easterhouse citizens advice bureau for the use of new technology and the expansion of its services.

Mr. Lang: The project did not fully meet the criteria for support under the urban programme, and the competition for funds is intense.

Drinking Water

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many schools in Scotland provide information and teaching on (a) water fluoridation and (b) the quality of drinking water and its effect on the health of the people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally. The relation between fluoridation and the incidence of dental caries has long figured in the ordinary grade biology syllabus and is now also covered in the standard grade science course. Exemplar curricular materials concerning fluoridation for this course have recently been distributed to education authorities.

Police Numbers

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the authorised establishment and actual numbers of (a) police officers and (b) civilians employed in each constabulary in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information as at 31 March 1988 was as follows:

Force	Regular Police		Civilians[1]
	Authorised Establishment	Strength[2]	Authorised Establishment[1]	Strength[1]
Central	568	579	123	121
Dumfries and Galloway	344	343	94	85
Fife	754	757	179	166
Grampian	1,008	1,011	313	298

Tayside	1,001	991	252	246
Total	13,692	13,475	3,717	3,380

[1] Excludes police cadets and part-time staff.
[2] Strength figures include officers on national training courses, on central service and with the Scottish Crime Squad.

Medical Secretaries

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what study he has made of the effects of regional differentials in levels of pay for medical secretaries on the recruitment and retention of such staff in the Borders region.

Mr. Rifkind: I have made no such study.

Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on the pay levels of medical secretaries.

Mr. Rifkind: Over the last two years, I have received a number of letters on this matter, both from individual medical secretaries and from hon. and right hon. Members writing on their behalf.

I have explained that health boards are able to use their discretion to upgrade medical secretaries' pay to the highest salary available, but essentially the matter is one for the boards to decide.

Natural Sites (Preservation)

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all private landowners in Scotland who have received payment for the preservation of natural sites of environmental or historical importance under the terms of the Wildlife and Countryside Act (Scotland) 1981.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Nature Conservancy Council is empowered to enter into management agreements with owners or occupiers of land designated as a site of special scientific interest, or within a national nature reserve. Details of individual payments are confidential, but data on the numbers and costs of such payments are published in the Nature Conservancy Council's annual report, copies of which are in the Library.

Mental Health (Code of Practice)

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to issue for consultation the code of practice under section 119 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The draft code of practice has been issued today to a wide range of interests in the mental health field inviting comments on the code within four months. The issue of this draft code represents a further significant step towards improving the lives of people who suffer from mental disorder through the guidance it will offer to doctors, nurses and other professions in the care and treatment of such patients. I am sure the draft will stimulate much interest, and the Secretary of State and I look forward to considering responses to the consultation.

Health Spending

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year since 1974-75 (i) total National Health Service expenditure, (ii) current expenditure on hospital and community health services, (iii) capital expenditure on hospital and community health service, (iv) expenditure on family practitioner services, (v) expenditure on centrally funded National Health Service services and (vi) expenditure on personal social services; if he will give each (a) in cash terms, (b) adjusted using the relevant pay and prices index and (c) adjusted using the gross domestic product deflator; and if he will place in the Library details of the methods used to make these adjustments.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 18 February 1988]: The information in the format requested is not fully available. Details of expenditure, broken down by service, in both cash terms and as adjusted by the gross domestic product deflator, are given in the following tables.

ENERGY

Sellafield

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what are the requirements placed upon British Nuclear Fuels by covenant to the Crown Commissioners under the deed of grant of 12 May 1975 in respect of any prior approval or consent needed from the commissioners before any modifications or additions can be made to the existing pipelines at Sellafield;

(2) what prior approval was sought from, and what consent was given by, the Crown Commissioners before the installation by British Nuclear Fuels of the 220 mm internal-diameter polyethylene discharge pipeline in June 1987 at Sellafield; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: British Nuclear Fuels plc consulted and received consent from the Crown Commissioners for the installation of the discharge pipeline in accordance with the covenant under the deed of grant.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether the 220 mm internal-diameter polytethylene discharge pipeline installed by British Nuclear Fuels at Sellafield during June 1987 complies with the requirements of the nuclear site licence and authorisation certificate for Sellafield; whether British Nuclear Fuels consulted the appropriate authorising parties with regard to compliance with the licence and certificate prior to the commissioning and use of the pipeline; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I understand that the polyethylene pipeline complies with the requirements of the Sellafield nuclear site licence and the liquid effluent authorisation.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many pipelines have been installed for the discharge of liquid effluent from the British Nuclear Fuels Sellafield plant in Cumbria to the marine environment of the Irish sea; what was the year of installation and of commissioning of each of the pipelines; what was the year during which any individual pipeline was permanently withdrawn from service; what was the type of material and the effective internal diameter of each of the pipelines; whether in each case the construction, installation and exact condition of the pipeline is in accord with the requirements and conditions of the nuclear site licence and the discharge authorisation certificate for the Sellafield site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Four such pipelines have been installed since 1949. In each case the construction and installation was in accordance with the requirements of the authorising Government Departments and regulatory bodies.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the power stations which will be allocated to each of the two generating companies which he proposes to establish.

Mr. Parkinson: This matter is still under discussion with the industry.

Bradwell Power Station

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the latest information he has received from the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and the Central Electricity Generating Board concerning the future of Bradwell No. 2 reactor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) on 4 July 1988, at column 715.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is to be the duration of the nuclear protection zone in the environs of Bradwell power station, after the decommissioning of the reactors.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The provisions of the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 will continue to apply to the site until no further radiation hazard exists.

ENVIRONMENT

Acid Rain

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about progress being made in his Department's attempts to reduce the incidence of acid rain in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: We have received a number of such representations.

We have recently reached agreement on a European Community directive on emissions from large combustion plants. This commits the United Kingdom to reducing total emissions from existing plants relative to 1980 levels, as follows: for sulphur dioxide, by 20 per cent. by 1993, by 40 per cent. by 1998 and by 60 per cent. by 2003; for nitrogen oxides, by 15 per cent. by 1993 and 30 per cent. by 1998. The directive also sets stringent new standards for emissions from new plants.

Water

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost to water authorities to comply with all existing European Economic Community directives on water if no derogations applied.

Mr. Moynihan: Some EC directives allow member states to give derogations from certain standards in certain circumstances. Where such derogations have been given, information on the cost of complying with the relevant standard is not available.

London Residuary Body (Property Sales)

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the amount raised by the London residuary body from property sales since its inception; and what is the current estimated value of its holdings.

Mr. Chope: During the first two years of the London residuary body's existence, completions of property sales amounted to £187 million. The remaining holdings, excluding the county hall site, are expected to realise over £100 million.

Landfill Waste Disposal

Mr. Cormack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding the disposal of clinical waste by landfill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Properly controlled landfill is an environmentally acceptable disposal route for a restricted range of clinical waste such as soiled surgical dressings, properly packaged instruments, pharmaceutical and chemical waste. Detailed guidance to hospitals, disposal authorities and others concerned is contained in waste management paper 25.

Water Companies

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement in respect of Government policy towards increased foreign investment in private water companies.

Mr. Moynihan: European Community law does not allow discrimination against investment by nationals of other Community members. As a trading nation we do not discriminate against foreign investment, just as we are pleased to see British firms expanding their interests overseas.

Special Grants Programme

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public funding has been awarded in grants under the special grants programme since 1984-85; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Since 1984-85 £8·329 million has been awarded in grants to voluntary organisations under the special grants programme.

Waste Materials

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what current proposals he has to encourage the recycling of waste materials and disposal of non-toxic waste materials; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government encourage the recycling of waste wherever it is economically viable. A number of initiatives have been taken to promote recycling by involving industry, local authorities, schools and the voluntary sector. The focus is on the creation of markets for recycled materials and efficient collection arrangements. The Department has spent £1·5 million per annum over the past 15 years on recycling and reduction of waste.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the latest timetable for water privatisation.

Mr. Moynihan: We intend to introduce the necessary legislation as soon as practicable. The restructuring and privatisation of the water authorities will follow enactment of the legislation.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to change procedures for the safe handling of hazardous waste imported into Britain.

Mr. Moynihan: We intend to lay regulations shortly to implement the EC directive on the transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste. The regulations will introduce new procedures for notification of certain hazardous waste imports.

Homelessness

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for levels of homelessness for England; and what are the corresponding figures for 1979.

Mrs. Roe: The latest estimates of households accepted as homeless appear in table 1 of "Local authorities' action under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 Housing Act: England. Results for first quarter 1988, Supplementary Tables", which is in the Library.

Figures for the first quarter of 1979 are not available, but for estimates of acceptances in 1979 and 1987 I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 17 June at column 358.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take to combat the increasing level of homelessness.

Mrs. Roe: Responsibility lies with local authorities, under part III of the Housing Act 1985. They have to make best use of the housing stock; to help them, additional resources of £74 million have been made available since October last year. We are reviewing the legislative provisions to see if further national initiatives would be helpful.

Rating Reform

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the likely headings for the new simplified distribution under the community charge.

Mr. Howard: The framework for the new system of assessment and distribution is set out in my Department's yellow booklet "The New Grant System", copies of which are available in the Library. This says, "There will be a separate assessment of need made for each authority, and it is likely that these will be built up for each of the major services, with a single assessment for all other services".

We will be bringing forward more detailed proposals for discussion with the local authority associations in the autumn.

Empty Properties

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will issue monthly figures on the number of Government-owned empty residential properties and the number of homeless families that could be housed in them.

Mrs. Roe: No.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Ridley: The information requested is not held centrally and could only be collected at disproportionate cost.

Computer Work Stations

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many computer work stations there are in his Department; what is the ratio of work stations to civil servants; and how he expects this to change over the next five years.

Mr. Ridley: About 1,750 in the Department of the Environment (excluding the Property Services Agency); a ratio of one work station to three members of staff. The figure includes all terminals, microcomputers and word processors but excludes portable text processors. Work stations will continue to be provided where they can give good value for money in meeting the Department's varied needs. No five-year plans are available.

In the Property Services Agency (which at present includes the Crown Suppliers) there are some 1,600 work stations representing one for every 10 members of staff. It is anticipated that by 1993, the number of work stations will have increased to about 5,000—a ratio of about one work station to three members of staff.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the composition of the senior information technology strategy committee in his Department; and how many times in the past year its meetings have been attended by Ministers.

Mr. Ridley: The members of the senior level information technology steering group for the Department of the Environment (Central) are:

Director of Administrative Resources (Chairman)
Director of Personnel Management and Training
Director of Housing Monitoring and Analysis
Deputy Director Building Research Establishment
Director, East Midlands Regional Office
Head of Business Efficiency Services
Head of Directorate of Planning Services Division 1
Head of Environmental Protection Statistics and Economics Division
Head of Finance Analysis Central and Taxation Division
Head of Finance Departmental Services Division
Head of Finance Local Authority Statistics Division
Head of IT Strategic Planning Division
CCTA representative

The chairman of the steering group consults Ministers as appropriate.

Members of the main information technology committee in the Property Services Agency are:

Principal Establishments Officer (Chairman)
Principal Finance Officer
Director of Information Technology
Director of Home Regional Services
Director of London Region
Chief Estates Surveyor
Director of Defence Services II
Chairman of Professional Computing Project Board
Director of CCTA
Director from Coopers and Lybrand

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary responsible for the Property Services Agency is kept informed of progress, and recently attended a presentation of the information technology strategy while on a visit to the Hastings computer centre.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of the staff in his Department at grades 1, 2 and 3 have attended courses or training on information technology awareness or management in the last 12 months.

Mr. Ridley: During the financial year 1987-88, one person at grade 2 and 10 people at grade 3 attended courses or training on information technology awareness or information technology management.

In addition, one person at grade 2 and three people at grade 3 attended management courses which had an information technology component. Also, in PSA regular information technology presentations are made to board members (grades 1, 2 and 3), IT committee members (grade 3) and regional and headquarters directors (grades 3 and 4) to keep them informed of developments.

Pier Terrace Wandsworth

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will investigate the circumstances in which the London residuary body sold the arches in Pier terrace, Wandsworth, in the light of its acknowledgement that the Greater London council had agreed the terms of a lease for the occupiers, Commodore Motors.

Mr. Chope: This is a matter for the London residuary body.

Minerals Planning

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has the power to impose on a mineral planning authority a programme of proposed sites if that authority refuses to agree one with British Coal;

(2) if mineral planning authorities were obliged to agree with British Coal a programme of proposed sites for opencast coal extraction, as suggested in "minerals planning guidance 3".

Mr. Trippier: The Government's recently issued advice in MPG3 on planning control over opencast coal mining recommends the industry to discuss with mineral planning authorities plans for future opencasting in their areas. There is no power to require an authority to agree long term plans or impose a programme of sites on them. However, we do consider that negotiations between authorities and both British Coal and private operators on possible future working can help facilitate the consideration of opencast coal planning applications.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will accept as a sound planning basis for an appeal against refusal by a mineral planning authority to grant permission for an opencast coal development, the refusal of that authority to agree a programme of proposed sites with British Coal;

(2) if the inclusion of a site within a programme of proposed sites in paragraph 20 of "Minerals Planning Guidance 3: Opencast Coal Mining" is material consideration to be taken into account by mineral planning authorities when deciding an individual application for that site.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 22 of MPG3, which advises that, where programmes have been agreed, the Secretary of State will have regard to them in approving development plans and deciding opencast appeals. I must stress, however, that whilst such programmes would provide helpful indications of where opencasting might be acceptable, they have no statutory basis, and the existence or otherwise of a programme would be one of the factors to be taken into account when determining an application or an appeal.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, in the light of paragraph 19 of "Minerals Planning Guidance 3", a mineral planning authority may deem it appropriate to draw up a policy of no development or of very limited development on the basis of strong or overwhelming local opposition;

(2) whether, in the light of the statement in paragraph 19 of "Mineral Planning Guidance 3" that where appropriate mineral planning authorities should draw up policies for opencast coal mining in their area, an authority may deem it inappropriate to do so on the basis of strong or overwhelming local opposition to that development.

Mr. Trippier: Minerals planning authorities are advised to draw up appropriate development plan policies for mineral working and the content of these should follow the advice in MPGs 1 and 3. When approving structure plan policies, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have regard to all relevant considerations, including any representations and objections received.

Algal Bloom (North and Baltic Seas)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields of 7 July, if he will list the recommendations put forward by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and agreed at the end of the symposium held on 23 and 24 June to consider the growth of algal bloom in the North and Baltic seas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The purpose of the meeting held at Bonn on 23-24 June to discuss algal blooms and seal deaths and hosted by the Federal Republic of Germany was to facilitate an exchange of scientific views between those participating principally through the exchange of scientific papers. Recommendations were drawn up by the meeting's rapporteur, but were not put to the vote and, as far as I am aware, no formal record of the meeting or recommendations has been circulated.

I understand that the principal recommendations put forward were on the following lines: nutrient inputs to coastal areas should be reduced, with particular reference to large river systems; contaminant inputs to the sea should be reduced by 50 per cent. and the reduction of nutrients to a similar extent should be expedited where a detrimental effect can be established; marine research should be accelerated and studies undertaken into reducing marine inputs of phosphorous and nitrogen through various pathways; airborne emissions of nitrogen should be reduced; agricultural practices and river protection systems should be examined with a view to reducing inputs to the sea from agriculture.

In the context of the sea areas affected by algal blooms which were considered by the symposium, these recommendations reflect the ministerial declaration issued after the second North sea conference, on whose implementation the United Kingdom has taken an early lead.

Water Metering

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to approve the 10 national water metering trial schemes; and if he will publish details of them.

Mr. Moynihan: It is for each water undertaker to decide whether and when to submit a meter trial scheme to the Secretary of State. So far, my right hon. Friend has received formal proposals for six schemes. The first of these, covering a small-scale trial in Chandlers Ford in Hampshire has been approved. The other schemes are under detailed consideration. As with all charges schemes made under section 31 of the Water Act 1973, water undertakers are required to publish metering trial schemes in such a manner as in their opinion will secure adequate publicity for them.

Trees (Sulphur Emission)

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research is being conducted by his Department into the effects on trees of sulphur emission from power stations.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 17 June 1988]: Details of all projects in the Department's air pollution research programme are contained in the compilation of Project Information Sheets. I have arranged for copies of the latest compilation to be placed in the Library of the House. Several projects are investigating ways in which sulphur oxides and their derivatives, in combination with other pollutants, such as nitrogen oxides and ozone, and with natural stresses such as drought and cold, may affect trees. Most of these projects will be reporting at the end of this year or in 1989. Research organisations involved include the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, the universities of Lancaster, Newcastle upon Tyne, Aberdeen and Imperial college London, and the Forestry Commission, are continuing work begun at the university of Ulster.

Tree Preservation Orders

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the available statistics for each of the last five years on the number of breaches of tree preservation orders.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The latest available information on the number of prosecutions in England and Wales is as follow:

	Number
1982	42
1983	54
1984	71
1985	50
1986	59

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to take any action to secure stricter compliance with tree preservation orders.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 7 July 1988]: I announced on 22 March a wide-ranging review of tree preservation policy and legislation. Pending the outcome of that review, I consider the penalties for contravening orders are sufficient to ensure general compliance. On summary conviction an offender may be fined up to £2,000, or twice the sum which appears to the court to be the value of the tree, whichever is the greater. On conviction on indictment, the fine is unlimited and, in determining the amount, the court is required to have regard to any financial benefit which has accrued, or appears likely to accrue, in consequence of the offence.

Football (Attendances)

Mr. Heffer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of the total number of attendances at all League matches, Football Association challenge cup, Littlewoods cup, Simod cup and Sherpa van trophy for the whole of the 1987-88 football season.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 7 July 1988]: Information held by the Football Association and the Football League shows the following attendances at football matches for the 1987-88 season:

	Million
League Matches	18·27
Football Association Challenge Cup	2·05
Littlewoods Challenge Cup	1·54
Simod Cup	0·29
Sherpa Van Trophy	0·34

Floating Jetty, Coulport

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to the answer of 28 June, Official Report, column 182, he will (a) name the main contractor selected for the floating jetty for RNAD Coulport and (b) give details of the material of which it will be constructed and its place of construction.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 7 July 1988]: Tenders for the floating jetty are being evaluated by the Property Services Agency and I am therefore unable at this stage to add anything to my answer of 14 June at column 137.

Water Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the capital expenditure figures for each of the water authorities in England and Wales in each of the past five years, expressed in 1987-88 prices, and for his Department's services only.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 11 July 1988]: The capital expenditure figures are set out in the folllowing table.

Capital Expenditure by Authority

Expressed in 1987-88 prices
£ million

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88

Rents

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now estimate by how much he expects the average rent charged in England by (a) local authorities, (b) housing associations and (c) private landlords to rise in real terms over the next four years; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe [holding answer 11 July 1988]: No. It will be for individual landlords to determine their own rents.

Rating Reform

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the latest estimated figure for those who will be subject to the poll tax in (a) the Metropolitan borough of Walsall and (b) the Walsall, North constituency.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 11 July 1988]: My right hon. Friend placed in the Library on 1 July a note showing the data used to estimate illustrative community charges in England for 1988-89. That note includes estimates of the adult population resident in each local authority area. Figures are not available for parliamentary constituencies.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ethiopia

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Ethiopian Government following the recent bombardment of Hauzien in Tigre.

Mr. Eggar: We have no information on the alleged incident but can confirm that military operations were taking place in Tigre at the end of June.

If reports of atrocities were confirmed we would, of course, condemn them.

Diplomatic Service

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many serving staff of the Diplomatic Service in the administrative group are from ethnic minorities having their antecedents in the Afro-Asian-Caribbean Commonwealth; and if he will give the numbers of such staff recruited in each of the years 1985 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Eggar: The Diplomatic Service participated in the recent voluntary ethnic monitoring survey for London and the south-east. Of those who have responded, only one serving member of the administrative group was identified as belonging to an ethnic minority with antecedents in the Afro-Asian Caribbean Commonwealth.

The Diplomatic Service started ethnic monitoring of recruitment in 1987. In 1987, no recruit to the administrative group came from the category mentioned.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many serving staff in the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service are (a) male and (b) female; and if he will give the numbers of (a) males and (b) females recruited into the group in each of the years 1985 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Eggar: There are 765 serving officers in the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service, of whom 692 are male and 73 are female.

The number of males and females recruited into the administrative grades in the years 1985 to 1987 are as follows:

	Males	Females
1985	12	10
1986	15	9
1987	19	6

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications there were from persons with qualifications obtained at polytechnics for posts in the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service in each of the years 1985 to 1987 inclusive.

Mr. Eggar: The number of applicants with qualifications obtained at polytechnics for posts in the administrative grades of the Diplomatic Service was as follows:

	Number
1985	211
1986	253
1987	298

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide a breakdown of the type of secondary school attended by applicants for posts in the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service in each of the years 1985 to 1987 inclusive, indicating what percentage in each case was successful.

Mr. Eggar: We do not keep this information.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide a breakdown of the universities from which applicants for posts in the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service came during each of the years 1985 to 1987 inclusive, indicating what percentage in each case was successful.

Mr. Eggar: The university background of applicants for the administrative grades of the Diplomatic Service for 1985 to 1987 is as follows:

	Applicants	Success rate Per cent.
1985
Oxford/Cambridge	387	3·1
Other universities	1,286	0·7
Others (polytechnics, etc.)	296	0
1986
Oxford/Cambridge	404	3·9
Other universities	1,320	0·4
Others (polytechnics, etc.)	350	0·6
1987
Oxford/Cambridge	380	6·0
Other universities	1,522	0·7
Others (polytechnics, etc.)	455	0

The detailed breakdown of the success rate of applicants from individual universities and polytechnics is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 29 June, Official Report, columns 262-63, if he is able to provide a breakdown of the type of history degree held by the 192 serving staff of the Diplomatic Service in the administrative group who graduated in history, indicating the numbers obtaining qualifications in (a) ancient, (b) medieval, and (c) modern history.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Belize

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what involvement his Department has had in plans for joint military operations or training exercises in Belize with any military power other than Belize; and if any such plans in which his Department anticipates involvement are being developed.

Mr. Eggar: None; and there are no plans to do so.

Official Secrets Act

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those international organisations from which the United Kingdom Government obtain information in confidence, as referred to in paragraphs 28 and 51 of the White Paper on "Reform of Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911" (Cm. 408); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We do not think that it would be practicable to compile a list as requested. Circumstances might arise in which we receive information of the kind specified in paragraphs 28 and 51 of the White Paper from a number of international organisations.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Donaghadee Carpets

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been paid out in grants in each of the last five years by the Department of Economic Development to Donaghadee Carpets.

Mr. Viggers: The amounts paid in selective assistance and standard capital grant are as follows:

1983-84	78,645
1984-85	228,106
1985-86	649,440
1986-87	381,616
1987-88	Nil

In addition, the company has received assistance under various training grant schemes operated by the Department.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been employed by Donaghadee Carpets in each of the past five years.

Mr. Viggers: The actual numbers of people employed is a matter for the management of the company. I understand the average of the number of people employed over the last five years to be in the region of 440.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been made redundant by Donaghadee Carpets in each of the last five years.

Mr. Viggers: I understand that last year the company made a number of temporary staff redundant. However the actual number of redundancies in any year is a matter for the management of the company.

Enterprise in Action Conference

Sir John Biggs-Davison: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the forthcoming enterprise in action conference.

Mr. Viggers: The first European enterprise conference is to be held at Queen's University, Belfast, from 28 September to 1 October 1988. In addition to support from the European Commission's small firms task force, sponsorship for the event has been attracted from the private sector. More than 300 potential delegates, mainly from Europe but also from further afield, have expressed their interest in the event. The main aims of the conference are the promotion of Northern Ireland as a centre of excellence in enterprise development and the sharing of ideas and experience on small business support with delegates from many parts of Europe.

It will also provide an excellent opportunity to demonstrate the Province's potential as a major conference and tourism destination.

Fishquarter and Rowreagh (Streams)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the streams between the townlands of Fishquarter and Rowreagh were last cleaned out; what steps have been taken to reduce flooding upstream of the crossing below the Kercubbin to Portaferry Road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: There are two designated water courses in the townlands of Fishquarter and Rowreagh—the Rowreagh drain and the Rowreagh branch drain. Maintenance work was carried out on both these water courses by the Department of Agriculture in April this year. The responsible Minister, my noble Friend Lord Lyell, is not aware of a flooding problem such as the right hon. Gentleman describes, but if he would provide further details of the nature and location of the problem, the matter will be investigated.

Union Flag

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply on 1 July, Official Report, columns 379-80, what arrangements he has made to fly the Union flag on the Department of Agriculture's drainage offices in The Mall West, Armagh City, on Tuesday 12 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: As the office will be closed on 12 and 13 July, arrangements have been made to hoist the Union flag on the afternoon of the last working day (Monday 11 July) and lower it on the morning of the next working day (Thursday 14 July)

Fountain Estate, Londonderry (Attacks)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary with a view to publishing a table in the Official Report showing for each month since 1 January 1986 to the latest available date how many reports or complaints were made to the Royal Ulster Constabulary about attacks upon the Fountain estate in Londonderry (a) by Republican gangs, (b) in the form of other sectarian attacks and (c) in the form of similar attacks upon Protestants or dwellings occupied by Protestants in the vicinity of the Fountain estate; and what number of other street disturbances not covered by (a), (b) or (c) above were reported.

Mr. Stanley: The information sought is not readily available from existing records and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the dates since 15 November 1985 of meetings between Ministers of Her Majesty's Government and Ministers of the Government of the Republic of Ireland, indicating in each case whether it was a formal and scheduled meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference under the Anglo-Irish Agreement, an informal meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference, a meeting of the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Council, or other, and listing Ministers present at each and subjects discussed at those which were not Intergovernmental Conference meetings.

Mr. Tom King [holding answer 27 June 1988]: There have been innumerable meetings, formal and informal, during the period in question. Information on them all could be assembled only at disproportionate cost. The following is a list of meetings of the Intergovernmental Conference during the period:

Fair Employment

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy to include in the legislation implementing the fair employment proposals a provision providing immunity from legal action for employers willing to redress religious imbalances in their work force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 8 July 1988]: Employers must of course act within the law, and the White Paper made it clear that direct discrimination will continue to be unlawful in all circumstances. But paragraph 3.23 of the White Paper also indicated that employers will be given statutory backing for measures designed to facilitate the access of under-represented groups to employment opportunities, notwithstanding the proposed prohibition of indirect discrimination.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what grants and other incentives will be available from Her Majesty's Government to encourage the development of fair employment.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 8 July 1988]: To encourage the development of fair employment the Government are operating a support scheme for private sector employers with 25 or more employees. It provides for free consultancy advice on best practice; and free training in objectively-based selection techniques. In addition, the Department of Economic Development is organising seminars for private sector employers. Funds will also be made available in the public sector to meet the cost of introducing and operating equal opportunities monitoring systems. Discussions on the development and funding of such systems are currently taking place between public sector bodies and the Department of Finance and Personnel.

Michael Tighe

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 30 June, Official Report, column 338, what are the reasons for his decision not to set up an inquiry into the circumstances in which listening devices came to be placed in the hayshed in which Michael Tighe was killed and as to why no police action was taken to ascertain the identity of those who planted the devices before the inquiry by the Manchester police.

Mr. Tom King [holding answer 11 July 1988]: It is not the practice to comment on such matters.

Amnesty International (Report)

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what response he intends to make to Amnesty International's report entitled "Northern Ireland: Killings by Security Forces and Supergrass Trials", a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King [holding answer 6 July 1988]: I have received a copy of this report, and its contents are being studied.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriculture

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to ensure that British agriculture will be on an equal footing with its European Community counterparts, from the point of view of research and development, following the outcome of the Barnes report.

Mr. Donald Thompson: It has always been my policy to ensure that British agriculture is not put at a competitive disadvantage within the European Community.

Potato Marketing Board

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give an indication as to the likely outcome and timing of the consultative document on the future structure of the Potato Marketing Board.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The revised potato market support arrangements introduced in Great Britain on 1 July 1985 are due to be revised before 30 June 1990. The review will consider, amongst other things, the future of the Potato Marketing Board. I am considering at present how to conduct the review and will make my intentions known as soon as possible. I intend that there should be full consultation with all sectors of the industry and I will give as much notice as possible of any changes.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, in the light of the integrated European Community market in 1992, he expects the Potato Marketing Board to continue its current basis of operation.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The advent of the single European Community market in 1992 will not affect the legal position of the Potato Marketing Board, which exists under United Kingdom domestic legislation. However, the potato market support arrangements are due to be reviewed before 30 June 1990. I am considering at present how to conduct the review and will make my intentions known as soon as possible. I intend that there should be full consultation with all sectors of the industry and will give as much notice as possible of any changes.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many full-time jobs in agriculture have been lost, by county, in each of the past five years.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Information on the numbers of full-time jobs lost in agriculture over the last five years is not available in the form requested. The June agricultural census does record in England and Wales the numbers of full-time farmers, partners and directors, family workers, hired workers and salaried managers working on agricultural holdings. Similar information is available for Scotland and Northern Ireland, although the categories adopted for labour are somewhat different in these countries. The available information will take some time to extract and collate by county for the five years, 1982, to 1987, but I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Cereals

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the impact the reduced cereal crop as a result of drought in North America will have on grain storage levels and cereal prices in 1988-89 in both the European Community countries as a whole and the United Kingdom particularly.

Mr. Donald Thompson: It is too early to make a realistic assessment of the effect of the drought in the USA on stock levels and cereal prices in 1988-89 in the European Community and the United Kingdom. Stocks and prices will be primarily influenced by the size of the EC and United Kingdom harvests and by the EC's export policy; the operation of the CAP acts to insulate the EC's grain market from much of the impact of world market fluctuations.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the anticipated reduction in the production of cereals in the United Kingdom, in the light of current European Community proposals on prices and stabilisers.

Mr. Donald Thompson: It is not possible to make such an estimate since the level of cereals production in any year is primarily determined by the weather.

Departmental Shareholdings

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all shareholdings in public and private companies still held by his Department.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The information requested is as follows:

Shareholdings held as at 31 March 1988

Company	Number of shares
Agricultural Co-operation and Marketing Services Ltd.	1

Pollution

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many water pollution incidents in England and Wales were caused by farm wastes in each of the last three years for which figures are available; how many of these incidents were classed as serious; how many prosecutions were commenced in respect of these serious incidents; and how many convictions resulted;

(2) what were the main causes of the serious water pollution incidents reported to his Department in each of the last three years for which figures are available in each of the water authority areas in England and Wales; how many prosecutions were commenced in respect of these incidents; and how many convictions resulted.

Mr. Gummer: The information is contained within the 1985, 1986 and 1987 MAFF/Water Authorities Association reports of water pollution from farm waste, as follows:

1985 report: tables 7-10
1986 report: tables 6-9
1987 report: tables 6-9

Copies of these tables are being placed in the Library of the House.

Food Aid

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the organisations responsible for the distribution to pensioners of surplus European Community beef and butter in the Liverpool, West Derby constituency; who was responsible for notifying pensioners of their entitlement; how the surplus was distributed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on 21 April at column 566.

Footpaths and Bridleways

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has plans, or has held discussions with other bodies, about introducing an experimental scheme to allow farmers to maintain footpaths and bridleways as agents of county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 11 July 1988]: My officials have held discussions with the Countryside Commission about an experimental scheme proposed by the Commission under which farmers would maintain footpaths and bridleways under contract to the highways authority. I would fully support the aims of such a scheme.

Nuvan

Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research has been conducted into less toxic or non-toxic alternatives to the pesticide Nuvan.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The development of new pesticides is a matter for industry. However, the Agriculture Departments and the Agriculture and Food Research Council conduct and support a good deal of strategic research into alternatives to pesticides and into less toxic pesticides. For example, my Department is collaborating with the Scottish Salmon Growers Association to fund a three-year project at the University of Stirling on sea lice infections in cultured salmon. The association is also funding other related work at the university and elsewhere.

Fish Quotas

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table of data for the whitefish sectoral allocations for cod, haddock, saithe and whiting for each of the producers' organisations involved for the year 1988 and the comparable figures for 1987; what quantity of fish has been recorded for the non-sector in 1988; and what special provisions have been made for vessels under 10 m in these allocations.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 7 July 1988]: I would be prepared to publish this information—which would reveal details of individual producer groups' allocations—only if such a course was acceptable to the industry. We shall shortly be consulting the industry on this, and when these consultations are completed, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

TRANSPORT

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the expenditure of his Department in the London Docklands development corporation area since 1981; and what is in prospect.

Mr. David Mitchell: Capital expenditure to date on the docklands light railway amounts to some £140 million for the initial railway and extend it to the City. Completion of the upgrading and the City extension and construction of the eastern extension to Beckton, a Bill for which is currently before the House, will cost in excess of £250 million. Olympia and York Canary wharf is contributing £68 million to the cost of the City extension and upgrading. The London Docklands development corporation paid for half the cost of the initial railway and will be meeting the whole cost of the eastern extension from increases in land values accruing as a result of the construction of the extension.

London Regional Transport has spent some £6 million since 1981 on improvements to the underground in the London Docklands development corporation area.

Docklands is also benefiting from the £10·5 million which British Rail has invested on electrification and station improvements to the north London line.

Since 1981 my Department has spent nearly £170 million on road projects of relevance to docklands now completed: the A406 South Woodford to Barking relief road; the A2 Rochester Way relief road and the A13/A117 tidal flow. Other trunk road schemes in the Department's programme, including improvements to the A13 in docklands, will involve expenditure of some £470 million by the mid-1990s.

Motor Accidents

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of people killed or seriously injured in motor accidents, by age, in each local authority area in the north-west region in each of the last five years; and what proportion of these accidents were related to excessive alcohol consumption.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The data requested can only be supplied at disproportionate cost. The following tables show the number of people killed or seriously injured, by age, in each county in the north-west region for each of the last three years.

There are no readily available statistics for accidents related to excessive alcohol consumption, by region.

Shared Ticketing

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place a copy of the London Regional Transport discussion document on shared ticketing in the Library; and if he will make a statement on the effects of the proposals in the document on transport fares in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. I understand that the document was prepared by LRT as a basis for internal discussion of options. No proposals arising from it have been put to this Department.

London Underground

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will initiate discussions with the chairman of London Regional Transport with a view to a new objective being established to construct new routes to relieve the acute congestion of passenger services on London Underground; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 25 March the setting up of a central London rail study jointly with British Rail and London Regional Transport. The study is considering, among other matters, the possible need for extensions to London's rail infrastructure. Initial results are expected shortly, although further work will be needed before a full report can be prepared.

British Flag Protection (Persian Gulf)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the names and ownership of the vessels which have applied for the protection of the British flag for their operations in the Persian Gulf since British naval vessels were dispatched there; and if he will introduce a levy on such vessels in order to pay for their protection.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is not possible to provide this information going back to September 1980, except at a wholly disproportionate cost.

There is no intention of introducing a levy on reflagged vessels to pay for their protection by the Royal Navy.

Car Indicators

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce a publicity campaign to encourage drivers to make proper use of their indicators and give adequate signals to other road users.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Our new leaflet on motorway driving issued earlier this year includes advice on the use of signals.

This is one of a number of key aspects of safe driving that is already fully covered in the Highway Code and other publications. We shall continue to draw attention to its importance.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to change emergency service procedures in the event of an accident involving the transportation of nuclear waste materials of all levels.

Mr. David Mitchell: The emergency procedures are kept under continuous review by both the operators and the Department. There are no current plans to change them.

Journey Times (London-Norfolk)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of average journey times from London to (a) Lowestoft, (b) Great Yarmouth and (c) Norwich by road; and what steps are being taken to improve them.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: When new road schemes are appraised, the journey times on the old road, the new road and the surrounding network are examined in detail. Improvements in the times for long journeys, such as those specified, come from a number of separate schemes along the route. There is a continuing programme of improvements on the A11 and A12.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate the rail freight capacity of the Channel tunnel; what are the forecasts of demand for rail freight through the Channel tunnel; and when he expects to make a statement about Eurotunnel's plans for allocating freight capacity through the tunnel in cases of excess demand.

Mr. David Mitchell: The rail freight capacity of the Channel tunnel will depend on a number of factors, notably the way in which the total available capacity is allocated between Eurotunnel's shuttle trains and the through trains which will be operated by the British Railways Board in conjunction with SNCF and other continental railway operators. The usage agreement between Eurotunnel and the railways entitles the railways to half the total available capacity of the tunnel; the way in which this share of the total capacity if allocated between passenger and freight services is a matter for the operators concerned, whose planning is still at an early stage. This issue is addressed in British Rail's report on the need for additional rail capacity in the longer term between London and the tunnel, which will be published shortly. The report will also include information on the demand forecasts for rail freight through the tunnel.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice he has given to British Rail on the criteria for assessing investment in the strategic rail networks of the regions outside the south-east; and whether he will make it his policy to review those criteria in the event that it is not possible to justify investment required to achieve Government policy towards dispersing freight and passenger traffic from the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: I expect BR's freight and passenger investment related to the Channel tunnel to be justified on a proper commercial basis. Section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 precludes subsidies for Channel-related services.

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent his Department monitors the technology and engineering expertise employed in the construction of the Channel tunnel; what assessment he has made of the implications for safety and the lifetime of the concrete tunnel linings, in the light of the recent problems of corrosion in the Hong Kong mass transit rail tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell [holding answer 11 July 1988]: The United Kingdom-French Channel Tunnel Intergovernmental Commission and Safety Authority has established procedures for monitoring the Channel tunnel project. These bodies are, in accordance with the Channel tunnel concession agreement, considering avant projets covering the design of the project. In doing so they are receiving reports from the independent Maitre d'Oeuvre that include assessments of the technology and engineering expertise being used. The difficulties that have arisen on the design of the Hong Kong mass transit rail tunnel are known; the Channel tunnel is being designed to avoid such problems.

Customs Clearance Depots

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will discuss with British Rail the case for developing an inland customs clearance freightliner depot in the north-west; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a matter for the British Railways Board and its subsidiary Freightliners Limited. I understand that Freightliners already has depots with associated customs clearance facilities in both Manchester and Liverpool.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to what plans British Rail has for the provision of inland customs clearance depots throughout the north of England to coincide with the opening of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have no detailed information yet. Under section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act, British Rail is required to publish by the end of 1989 a plan setting out its proposals for services through the Channel tunnel and any proposals for works or other development in connection with these services, including inland clearance depots.

Historic Motor Vehicles

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether European Community directives will restrict the use of historic motor vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. I can assure my hon. Friend that there are no plans to restrict the use of historic vehicles through the introduction of retrospective legislation. It would be unreasonable to require the original features of old vehicles to be adapted or replaced in order to comply with the various EC directives which apply to new vehicles. The recent EC directives on vehicle emissions apply only to new vehicles. There is no question of their being made retrospective.

I am sure the Commission has no plans to make any proposals that would adversely affect the many historic vehicle enthusiasts in Europe.

Vehicle Lighting

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take to implement the decision of the European Court of Justice about dim-dip lighting devices on vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the light of the court's decision I shall shortly issue for comment draft regulations amending the Road Vehicles Lighting Regulations 1984 to exempt from the requirement to fit dim-dip systems and side-marker lamps vehicles which have been fitted with lighting and light-signalling devices in accordance with the EEC vehicle lighting directive and fully meet all the requirements of that directive.

The effect of this amendment will be that motor vehicles will be required either to be equipped with headlamp levelling systems in accordance with the EEC requirements or with the more simple dim-dip requirements. Both systems, if use correctly, can be helpful in reducing glare from headlamps.

Motor vehicles sold since 1 April 1987 are required to have headlamps with a dim-dip system.

There has been a long-standing controversy about the use of lights at night in towns where there is good street lighting. Side lights are not always bright enough to make a moving vehicle readily visible, but modern dipped headlights can be too dazzling, especially in wet weather, and negate the benefits of street lighting.

The purpose of dim-dip is to improve road safety by providing a light more visible than a side light but without the glare associated with a dipped headlight. Dim-dip comes on automatically whenever a vehicle is driven with only the side lights switched on.

Some EC countries (Germany, The Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Denmark) forbid driving on side lights, a problem which dim-dip overcomes automatically in the United Kingdom. Apart from the problem of dazzle, a difficulty these countries face is that in marginal lighting conditions some vehicles are completely unlit while others use dipped headlights. The remaining EC countries (United Kingdom, Ireland, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Greece) do not suffer from this difficulty to the same extent.

The dim-dip requirement was challenged by the European Commission. The Commission pleaded that the intention behind the vehicle lighting directive was to prohibit member states requiring the fitting of further devices not listed in that directive.

The United Kingdom argued in the court that the articles of the directive, which define its scope, plainly confined the scope to the installation of the vehicle lighting devices which are listed in the directive and that it therefore did not prohibit a requirement for any further device such as a dim-dip device or a side marker lamp. Side marker lamps had been required in the United Kingdom, to the full knowledge of the Commission, for many years.

The court decided that the directive had been intended to prohibit the requirement of further devices not imposed by that directive,

"since motor vehicles complying with the technical requirements laid down therein must be able to move freely within the Common Market."

Railway Electrification

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will discuss with British Rail the case for bringing forward investment proposals for the electrification of (a) the Midland main line beyond Bedford, (b) the line from Manchester to Preston and Blackpool and (c) the line from Leeds to the freight liner depot at Stourton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. It is for the British Railways Board, as manager of the railways, to identify and put forward sound investment proposals. It would be quite wrong for the Government to ask it to put forward schemes which it believes to be uneconomic.

West Coast Railway Lines, Scotland

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to alter the existing ownership structure of the west coast railway lines, Fort William to Mallaig and Inverness to Kyle of Lochalsh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell [holding answer 8 July 1988]: I have no such plans. Any proposals to dispose of individual lines are matters in the first instance for British Rail. British Rail provincial sector has assured me it has no proposals for changes affecting these lines.

Unlicensed Vehicles (Greater London)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the total cost of each of the campaigns organised by his Department since 1981 in London to crack down on motor tax dodgers; and what has been the estimated amount of excise duty collected as a result of each campaign.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 8 July 1988]: No figures are available for police costs associated with campaigns. The following table gives details of the Department's total costs for each London campaign together with the estimated additional revenue and fines arising.

London campaigns: Costs and revenue gained

Year	Department of Transport costs £	Estimated revenue from induced licensing and prosecutions £
1988	123,100	Results awaited
1987	95,000	7,300,000
1986	99,800	6,700,000
1985	78,500	No reliable figures available
1984	92,000	No reliable figures available
1983	[1]14,400	No reliable figures available
1982	[1]13,800	No reliable figures available
1981	[1]12,900	No reliable figures available

[1] No paid publicity. Identifiable staff costs only.

Motor Accidents

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has information relating to the driving experience of private vehicle drivers involved in motor accidents.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has made a study of accident involvement rates according to age. This shows that young drivers have a much higher accident involvement rate than the middle age group. The involvement rates rise again in old age.

I am placing copies of the report in the Library.

The Transport and Road Research Laboratory is currently undertaking a study of drivers with less than 10 years driving experience, in order to determine accident patterns for this group.

The results are due later this year.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the capital and operating costs, the benefit for each pound sterling of capital cost and the net present value of the rail link now being constructed with the support of his Department at Stansted airport.

Mr. David Mitchell: The capital cost of the rail link to Stansted airport is currently estimated at £45 million. As this project is a commercial venture, the operating costs and net present value of the project are confidential matters, but the investment was approved on the basis of a financial appraisal which showed that the service would operate profitably and require no grant. No estimate has been made of any external benefits generated by this scheme, because it has always been intended to be justified on financial grounds alone.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the operating and development costs of Stansted airport, the revenue generated by that airport and the airline charges employed at that airport; whether the Government's objective, stated at the time the British Airports Authority airports were restructured, that Stansted airport should operate on a financial basis independent of Heathrow and Gatwick airports, has been achieved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: When the Government gave investment approval to the then British Airports Authority in 1986, the cost of the current development at Stansted airport was put at £290 million. We understand from BAA plc that the charges levied at the airport are as follows:

CHARGE ON LANDING

Charge is based on maximum total weight authorised, and it consists of two elements:

(1) A fixed charge.

(2) A variable charge at a rate per tonne for aircraft with a maximum total weight authorised in excess of 50 metric tonnes.

Domestic and International Flights

	1 April to 31 October £	1 November to 31 March £
Helicopters	18·00	18·00
Fixed wing aircraft not exceeding 16 metric tonnes	20·00	20·00
Fixed wing aircraft over 16 metric tonnes not exceeding 50 metric tonnes	38·00	38·00
Aircraft over 50 metric tonnes	72·00 [1]2·31	38·00 plus [1]0·94

[1] Per metric tonne or part thereof in excess of 50 metric tonnes.

PASSENGER CHARGE

Charge payable per terminal departing passenger on flights operated with a maximum authorised weight in excess of five metric tonnes.

Time period of take-off	Domestic flights £	International flights £
June to September/Saturdays and Sundays	3·30	4·00
June to September/Monday to Friday	2·90	2·90
October to May/At all times	1·60	1·60

AIRCRAFT PARKING CHARGES

The standard charge for parking an aircraft is based on its maximum total weight authorised.

Charges per 24 hours or part thereof in excess of 24 hours

Not exceeding two metric tonnes	8·35
Over two metric tonnes, not exceeding five metric tonnes	16·60
Over five metric tonnes, not exceeding 10 metric tonnes	25·00
Over 10 metric tonnes not exceeding 15 metric tonnes	38·05

Charges per metric tonne per hour, or part thereof in excess of two hours

	Pence
Over 15 metric tonnes	26

Note: The above charges are exclusive of value added tax
Source: BAA Conditions of Use, April 1988.

The operating costs and revenue generated at Stansted airport are commercial matters for the airport operator and the right hon. Member could get in touch with Stansted Airport Limited. The question of the financial basis on which Stansted airport operates is one for the Civil Aviation Authority, which has responsibility for the economic regulation of airports designated under part IV of the Airports Act 1986. I have asked the chairman of the authority to write to the right hon. Member direct.

Sludge Farm (Heathrow Airport)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with the action so far taken by the British Airports Authority plc to relocate the sludge farm at Heathrow airport; what assessment he has made of the implications of its early relocation for the aviation interests of the United Kingdom; and whether he intends to use the Government's influence to ensure that this course is pursued by the British Airports Authority plc as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We understand from BAA plc that technical trials to determine the optimum method by which the Perry Oaks site might be released to Heathrow airport continue. The 1985 White paper "Airports Policy" (Cmnd. 9542) made it clear that the removal of the sludge works and release of the land to the airport was "highly desirable," and that remains the Government's view. Discussions between BAA plc and the Thames water authority on the future of the Perry Oaks site are primarily a matter for the two organisations concerned.

British Airports Authority plc

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when Her Majesty's Government expect to reach a decision about the referral of the London subsidiary companies of the British Airports Authority plc for investigation by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Airports Act 1986 provides for the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, following a reference by the Civil Aviation Authority, to review and report on airport charges and operational activities at airports designated for economic regulation purposes under part IV of the Act. Airports so designated include the following subsidiaries of BAA plc: Heathrow Airport Ltd., Gatwick Airport Ltd. and Stansted Airport Ltd.

Air Safety

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has been monitoring the published evidence given to the Transport Committee on air safety; whether he was aware before the Committee's inquiry of the delays in realising the 52 movements per hour throughput at Heathrow, Gatwick, Stansted and Luton airports, assumed by the inspector of the Stansted/Heathrow planning inquiries to be achieved in 1992; and if he will now instruct the Civil Aviation Authority to undertake to publish an evaluation of the airspace implications of difficult capacity options in London.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has naturally followed with interest the evidence presented to the Select Committee, including the memorandum submitted from the Civil Aviation Authority in CAP 537. My right hon. Friend last week commissioned from the CAA a wide review of the requirement for airport capacity up to 2005, with separate advice on strategies to make good use of the available airspace in the London area in the nearer term. The inspector at the airports inquiries stated that the accommodation of Stansted alongside Heathrow, Gatwick and Luton airports would require substantial reorganisation of airspace in the London area, concluding that such reorganisation could be achieved.

Air Traffic

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make a statement on updated forecasts of air traffic demand, and the implications of these forecasts for the Government's airports policy.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect revised forecasts of United Kingdom air passenger traffic demand to 2005 to be published before the end of the year. Their implications for airports policy will be assessed in the light of advice from the Civil Aviation Authority on the adequacy of United Kingdom airports capacity over the same period.

Unlicensed Vehicles (Greater London)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's estimate of the number of unlicensed vehicles in the Greater London area.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 8 July 1988]: No figures are available for the number of unlicensed vehicles evading duty in the Greater London area. Figures for unlicensed vehicles include vehicles currently off the road, including those temporarily in the hands of motor dealers, as well as vehicles in use on the road whose owners are evading vehicle excise duty.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list, by London boroughs, the number of unlicensed vehicles detected in the 1988 campaign against motor tax evaders.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 8 July 1988]: The figures are not intended as a reflection of the distribution on unlicensed vehicles in each area.

The number of unlicensed vehicles detected in roadside checks in each of the London boroughs during the 1988 campaign is given in the following table.

Borough	Number of VED offence reports
City of London	447

SOCIAL SERVICES

Health Care

12. Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards increasing public awareness of the benefits of preventive health care; and what steps he is taking to encourage healthy eating.

Mrs. Currie: We are making available £25 million from central funding this year to promote good health through health education programmes. We are also helping prevent disease at an early stage through the breast cancer and cervical cancer screening service. A major campaign to help eradicate childhood infections including measles, mumps and rubella will be launched shortly.

As for healthy eating, the Government aim at:

accurate information on food value;
ready access to a wide variety of foods;
steadily rising prosperity and personal disposable income.

all of which we have achieved under this Government.

15. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how the proposals in the primary health care White Paper are intended to help to promote health and prevent illness.

Mr. Newton: In a variety of ways, including making health promotion and the prevention of disease a clearer requirement in practitioners' contracts, and introducing targets for vaccination immunisation and cytology.

19. Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how the proposals in the primary health care White Paper are intended to help make services more responsive to the consumer.

Mrs. Currie: Specific White Paper measures include:

—more information for patients through FPC lists and practice leaflets;
—simpler procedures for changing doctors;
—changes to GP's remuneration system.

Talks are underway on details of other White Paper measures with the relevant professions.

71. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how the proposals in the primary health care White Paper are intended to raise standards of care.

Mr. Newton: Many of the proposals in the White Paper "Promoting Better Health" will contribute to raising standards of care. In the case of the family doctors, changes to the doctors' remuneration system and terms of service will encourage doctors to emulate the best practices in the services they offer. Other changes include extending and developing training and teamwork in primary care generally and giving a stronger voice to the consumer. We will also require family practitioner committees to play an enhanced role in the management of the family practitioner services with the aim of securing continuing improvements in the level, quality and cost effectiveness of service provision and greater accountability from those providing and managing these services.

77. Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how he proposes to improve primary health care services in inner cities.

Mr. Newton: By raising standards and extending services, the whole thrust of the White Paper "Promoting Better Health" will benefit inner cities. Specific proposals aimed at improving services in these areas include strengthening primary care teams with the addition of health care professionals such as link workers, physiotherapists, counsellors and chiropodists as well as more practice nurses, and new incentives to attract pharmacies to inner cities and to encourage more doctors and dentists to work in these areas.

83. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to give patients a wider range of choice in obtaining high quality primary health care services.

Mr. Newton: One of the main themes of the White Paper "Promoting Better Heath" is to give patients a wider range of choice in obtaining high quality primary health care services. We intend to enable patients to make a more informed choice by making more information available about services provided by local doctors and dentists. We plan to strengthen primary health care teams by encouraging the inclusion of physiotherapists, counsellors, chiropodists and other health care professionals. We also plan to change the NHS contract with family doctors so that a greater range of services is provided, and to amend the dentists' NHS contract to improve the availability and quality of dental services.

Pensioners

13. Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much pensioners' average real total incomes have changed since 1979.

Mr. Moore: Pensioners' average total net incomes grew by 2·7 per cent. a year in real terms between 1979 and 1985, compared with 0·6 per cent. a year between 1974 and 1979. The overall rate of growth was 18 and 3 per cent. respectively. The rate of growth of pensioners' inoomes between 1979 and 1985 was twice as fast as for the population as a whole.

36. Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of pensioners receive income from savings.

Mr. Scott: Seventy per cent. of pensioners had income from savings in 1985, the latest year for which figures are available.

94. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much pensioners incomes from savings have increased since 1979.

Mr. Scott: The average income of pensioners from savings increased by 53 per cent. in real terms between 1979 and 1985, the latest year for which figures are available, equivalent to 7·3 per cent. a year.

Heating Charges

14. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on fixed heating charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: We have received representations, including some from my hon. Friend, about some households receiving income support who experienced a cash reduction in housing benefit as a result of changes in the rules applying to fixed heating charges. Income support recipients in vulnerable groups can apply for transitional payments from the Glasgow unit.

Medical Equipment (Report)

16. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action was taken arising out of the Advisory Council on Applied Research and Development report on medical equipment.

Mrs. Currie: The Government's response to the ACARD report, summarising action then being taken or planned on the reports recommendations, was published in February 1987. Since then a wide programme of further improvements has been implemented and other developments in the fields of research, evaluation and equipment management are being vigorously pursued.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act

17. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what study his Department has made of the extent to which local social services authorities are implementing section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Department receives regular returns on many services provided under section 2 of the 1970 Act, as well as information from the Social Services Inspectorate. But it is local authorities which are responsible for implementing the Act.

46. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled last met the organisations of and for disabled people to discuss the extent to which local authorities are implementing section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

60. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled last met organisations of and for disabled people to discuss the extent to which local authorities are implementing section 1 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

63. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the implementation by local authorities of section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

80. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will meet the organisations of, and for, disabled people to discuss the implementation by local authorities of sections 1 and 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

137. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the implementation of sections 1 and 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Scott: I frequently meet organisations of and for disabled people but I have not recently been asked for a meeting specifically about implementation of sections 1 and 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act. The Department receives regular returns on certain services provided by local authorities under the Act as well as informtion from other sources including the Social Services Inspectorate. We have received no evidence that local authorities are generally failing to undertake their responsibilities under sections 1 and 2 of the Act. We do, however, follow up any specific cases referred to the Department where it was alleged that a local authority is in breach of its statutory duty.

General Practitioners

18. Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to improve the distribution of general practitioners.

Mr. Newton: We shall discuss with the Medical Practices Committee how to take forward the proposals in the White Paper "Promoting Better Health" to improve the distribution of family doctors. These include plans to give greater emphasis to local medical and social factors in deciding on where doctors are needed. The White Paper also announced that the Government will introduce a new allowance especially related to working in areas of deprivation. If necessary other changes to the remuneration system will be introduced to help doctors in sparsely populated areas.

75. Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to improve the training of general practitioners.

Mr. Newton: The White Paper "Promoting Better Health" provides for the introduction of a new postgraduate educational allowance for general medical practitioners. We are aiming by this means to encourage all practitioners to become involved in regular programmes of education and training throughout their careers. The content of education and training is largely for the profession itself to decide; but the Department's policies for allocating funds for vocational training and continuing education are designed to foster the development and improvement of these activities.

Clinical Grading Review

20. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on implementation of the clinical grading review.

Mr. Newton: Health authorities have been issued with comprehensive guidance on the implementation of the new clinical grading structure and have been asked to complete the exercise by 31 October 1988.

72. Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that the clinical grading review is based on actual jobs performed at the beginning of April and that managers will not be rewriting job descriptions.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) earlier today.

Social Security (Computerisation)

21. Mr. Knowles: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the social security computerisation programme.

Mr. Portillo: The Department is making a massive investment in information technology to achieve greater efficiency in administration, a better service to the public and better jobs for staff. A system has already been delivered, on time and working well, for the administration of family credit. The systems for income support and pensions will start to be installed during the next 12 months: modernisation of the existing unemployment benefit system is also on the way. The network should be complete by mid-1992, and will represent a mojor step forward in the administration of social security.

54. Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the social security computerisation programme.

79. Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made with the introduction of computerisation in his Department.

Mr. Portillo: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) earlier today.

NHS (Reform)

22. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to publish a Green Paper on the financing and reform of the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: We are proceeding with our review of the National Health Service, and will bring forward proposals in due course. No decision has yet been taken on the form in which these proposals will be promulgated.

Child Care

23. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy on child care in the light of the study "Caring for Children, Report of the EC Childcare Network" by Bronwen Cohen and "Childcare and Equality of Opportunity" by Peter Moss both published by the Commission of the European Communities at the end of June; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: These reports deal with child care largely from the point of view of working parents. Our view is that it is for the parents who go out to work to decide how best to care for their children. If they want or need help in this task they should make the appropriate arrangements and meet the costs.

Our objective is that there should be a range of day care services so that parents can make a choice. Public provision by local authorities should concentrate on the particular needs of children from families with health or social difficulties.

North Western Regional Health Authority

24. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department next plans to review the performance of the North Western regional health authority.

Mrs. Currie: The performance of regional health authorities is kept under continuous review. The ministerial review meeting, which takes place each year is, in the case of the North Western regional health authority, scheduled for 27 July.

Diabetics

25. Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent improvements have been made in services for diabetics.

Mrs. Currie: Diabetics, like others, have benefited from new techniques employed in the National Health Service; early diagnosis of diabetic retinopathy followed by laser treatment may prevent blindness; increasing number of those with end stage renal failure are accepted for renal replacement therapy. As part of the development of services in the community disposable syringes and needles were made available from general practitioners in September 1987; blood glucose strips became similarly available on 1 June this year.

District General Hospital (Solihull)

26. Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the effect on the neighbouring health authorities of the coming into full operation of the intended new district general hospital in Solihull.

Mrs. Currie: The development of Solihull district general hospital at a cost of £23·2 million is part of the west midlands' long-term strategy for increasing the provision of health services in the growing population centres surrounding Birmingham. The population of Solihull and of neighbouring districts will all benefit. For detailed information my hon. Friend may care to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority.

NHS Ancillary Staff

27. Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on behalf of the National Health Service ancillary staffs seeking an improvement in their pay and working conditions.

40. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on behalf of the National Health Services ancillary staffs seeking an improvement in their pay and working conditions.

48. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on behalf of the National Health Services ancillary staffs seeking an improvement in their pay and working conditions.

98. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received on behalf of the National Health Service ancillary staffs seeking an improvement in their pay and working conditions.

Mr. Newton: We have received two requests to meet staff side representatives of the ancillary staffs Whitley Council. Pay and conditions of NHS ancillary staff are matters for negotiation in that council. I have replied that in my view the normal processes of negotiation should be allowed to run their course, and that I would therefore prefer not to meet the staff side at this stage. I expressed my hope that a negotiated settlement would shortly be achieved.

31. Mr. Allen Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to ensure that health authorities will be in a position to finance an improvement in the pay and conditions of ancillary workers in the National Health Service.

37. Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to ensure that health authorities will be in a position to finance an improvement in the pay and conditions of ancillary workers in the National Health Service.

101. Mr. Wall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to ensure that health authorities will be in a position to finance an improvement in the pay and conditions of ancillary workers in the National Health Service.

121. Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to ensure that health authorities will be in a position to finance an improvement in the pay and conditions of ancillary workers in the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: The pay and conditions of service of NHS ancillary staff are matters for negotiation in the ancillary staffs Whitley council. I understand that the current round of negotiations should be resumed later this month.

As health authorities operate within the cash planning system, they are expected to plan flexibly to meet pay increases and other costs from within the pool of resources available to them. This pool includes their increased cash allocations for the year, cost improvement savings and funds raised through income generation schemes.

Trasidrex

28. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received any complaints about the drug Trasidrex with regard to allergies or lung problems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Trasidrex is a combination of a beta-blocker (oxprenolol hydrochloride) and a thiazide diuretic (cyclopenthiazide), used in the treatment of hypertension. We are not aware of any complaints received about this drug. However, since 1979 the Committee on Safety of Medicines has received reports from doctors of two cases of bronchospasm and two of dyspnoea (difficulty in breathing) in association with Trasidrex. In each of these cases, the reports relate to the most important suspected reaction to the drug, and do not necessarily indicate a causal relationship.

The manufacturer's data sheet for Trasidrex warns doctors that "as with other beta-blockers, bronchospasm ... may occasionally be precipitated in susceptible patients", and advises that

"particular caution should be observed when treating asthmatics, chronic bronchitics or other individuals where bronchospasm may be provoked".

The data sheet also notes that "in a few cases, allergic skin reactions ... have been reported".

NHS Review

29. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in response to his review of the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

47. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in response to his review of the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

81. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in response to his review of the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

86. Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in response to his review of the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: We regularly receive representations about the future of the National Health Service. It is not possible to distinguish between those representations which have been made specifically in the context of the review and those which have not.

39. Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations about his review of the National Health Service he has received from trade unions and other bodies representing Health Service staffs; and what has been the nature of their representations.

62. Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations about his review of the National Health Service he has received from trade unions and other bodies representing Health Service staffs; and what has been the nature of their representations.

133. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations about his review of the National Health Service he has received from trade unions and other bodies representing health service staffs; and what has been the nature of their representations.

Mr. Moore: We have received a number of representations from such bodies, covering a wide range of issues.

44. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to announce the results of his review of the National Health Service.

103. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to announce the results of his review of the National Health Service.

109. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to announce the results of his review of the National Health Service.

111. Mr. Terry Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to announce the results of his review of the National Health Service.

Mr. Moore: We are continuing to examine a range of options for improving the National Health Service and shall bring forward proposals in due course.

Cancer Screening

30. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the progress of the breast cancer screening programme.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friends the Members for Wyre (Mr. Mans), York (Mr. Gregory), Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes), Thurrock (Mr. Jarman) and Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard) on 14 June at column 155.

102. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources are being provided to set up the breast cancer screening programme.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire, East (Mr. MacKay) on 14 June, at column 155.

East and West Dorset Health Districts

32. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the increase in health budget for the East and West Dorset health districts in 1988 against 1987.

Mr. Newton: The information for financial years 1987-88 and 1988-89 is not available centrally. Allocations to individual health authorities are a matter for the regional health authority. My hon. Friend may therefore wish to contact the chairman of the Wessex regional health authority.

Child Abuse

33. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will meet the director of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to discuss its recent report on child abuse.

Mr. Newton: I am arranging to meet the director of the NSPCC to discuss a number of matters, including the report to which the hon. Member refers.

41. Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to introduce legislation to tackle the problem of child abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my statement to the House on Lord Justice Butler-Sloss's report on the inquiry into child abuse in Cleveland on 6 July, at column 1062, when I said that legislation will be brought before Parliament at the earliest practicable opportunity.

49. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he now intends to take to tackle the problem of child abuse; and if he will make a statement.

117. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he now intends to take to tackle the problem of child abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Members to my statement to the House on publication of the report of the judicial inquiry into child abuse in Cleveland on 6 July, at columns 1061-63.

127. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy on the training of social workers to deal with the problem of child abuse.

Mr. Newton: I announced a specific grant of 70 per cent. in support of expenditure of £10 million in the child care field in 1989-90 in my statement to the House on publication of the report of the judicial inquiry into child abuse in Cleveland on 6 July, at column 1062. This recognises the importance of social workers acquiring professional skills in the field of child abuse. In addition, we have already set up a centrally funded inter-disciplinary training initiative on child sexual abuse. Several of the projects so far established will be of benefit to social workers, and further projects are under consideration.

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by health authority the number of children taken into care in each of the past 10 years for protection in cases of sexual abuse.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested is not available centrally. A pilot survey of children on child protection registers as at 31 March 1988 will be followed by an annual statistical return from 31 March 1989. A provisional summary of the information from the pilot survey will be published this Autumn.

Staff (Relocation)

34. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his plans to relocate clerical and administrative staff in the regions.

87. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the report on "Business of Service" on the social security services.

115. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the report "Business of Service" on the social security services.

118. Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has for the transfer of administrative staff in his Department from London and for their relocation in the provinces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of state announced on 23 June at column 273-4 the publication of two reports "The Business of Service" and "Out of Town". Both reports recommended that relocation of some work from London would increase the effectiveness and efficiency of the Department of Health and Social Security, and "Business of Service" pointed to the improvement to service to the public which would result.

We are considering the two reports very carefully. Consideration is proceeding rapidly and we shall make a

Nurses (Pay)

35. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much the pay of ward sisters has increased since 1979.

Mr. Newton: The extent to which the pay of an individual sister has increased since 1979 depends on the duties and responsibilities of the post occupied, since these determine how the job is graded in the new clinical grading structure; and on whether or not the sister works in London.

The table sets out a range of outcomes for ward sisters on regrading.

Real increases in pay of ward sisters on the maximum of their scale since 1979

	Basic pay		Basic pay including inner London allowance and London supplement
	Real terms cash increase at 1988 prices £	Real terms percentage increase	Real terms cash increase at 1988 prices £	Real terms percentage increase
Scale F	3,434	37·9	4,356	43·4
Scale G	4,859	53·6	5,781	57·6
Scale H	6,284	69·3	7,206	71·8

Notes:

1. The real increases above represent the increases in basic pay and London additions between April 1979 and April 1988 deflated by the change in the retail prices index between the beginning of the 1979-80 pay round year and the beginning of the pay round year 1988-89.
2. The above figures do not take into account changes in gross earnings which for a ward sister in 1987-88 were estimated to be, on average, 15 per cent. higher than the level of basic pay (excluding London allowances).

57. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from health authorities on the funding by his Department of the recent pay increase made to nurses.

Mr. Newton: Health authorities generally have welcomed the pay award and the additional funding made available.

95. Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his Department's guidance on clinical grading for senior night nursing staff.

Mr. Newton: The management guidance which has been issued to health authorities on the grading of senior night duty posts indicates that they may be graded at any of the new clinical scales from F to I inclusive, depending upon the duties and responsibilities to be discharged. A copy of the guidance is in the Library.

104. Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much the pay of staff nurses in inner London has increased since 1979.

Mr. Newton: The extent to which the pay of an individual nurse will have increased since 1979 as a result of the recent pay award will depend on the duties and responsibilities of the post occupied. However, the pay of a staff nurse on qualification working in inner London is now £9,677, including London weighting and London supplement. This is a real terms increase of £2,960, or 44·1 per cent. since 1979. The maximum pay of a staff nurse with post-basic nursing qualifications is now £12,538, including London weighting and London supplement. This is a real terms increase of £4,610 or 58·1 per cent. since 1979.

Social Workers

38. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received regarding the decision of the Government not to fund the QDSW three-year basic training course for social workers.

51. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received regarding the decision of the Government not to fund the QDSW three-year basic training course for social workers.

74. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received regarding the decision of the Government not to fund the QDSW three-year basic training course for social workers.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on 23 June at column 723.

Pensions

42. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to publicise the incentives the pension reforms provide for people to take out a personal pension.

65. Mr. Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to publicise the new opportunities there will be to take out a personal pension as a result of the pension reforms.

Mr. Portillo: The Department has just concluded a television and press advertising campaign to alert both employers and employees to the new pensions choice which are now available as a result of the Social Security Act 1986. A leaflet setting out the new pension arrangements is available from DHSS local offices and information guides for employers and employees explaining the new options in more detail can be obtained from the DHSS Leaflets Unit, PO Box 21, Stanmore Middlesex, HA7 1AY.

67. Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to increase the extra pension for those over 80 years.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans at present to increase the age addition to retirement pension, paid to pensioners aged 80 and over. The income support scheme provides a higher pensioner premium from age 80, worth to a single pensioner £2·40 a week more than the standard pensioner premium. This higher premium, which is directed towards pensioners on low incomes, is a more effective use of resources than increasing the age addition for all pensioners aged 80 or over, regardless of individual need.

84. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the outcome to date of his pension reforms.

Mr. Portillo: As the full range of the new pensions options become available only from 1 July, it is not yet possible to make an assessment of the reforms.

District Health Authorities (Income Generation)

43. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made on income generation by district health authorities within the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: Preliminary estimates made by health authorities in England are that they will generate additional income of around £11 million in 1988-89.

AIDS

45. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has for further publicity campaigns to help prevent the spread of AIDS.

Mr. Newton: Responsibility for carrying forward the mass media AIDS public education campaign rests with the Health Education Authority. The authority's operational plan for 1988-89 includes provision for further campaigns aimed at the general public and for specific groups in society. These will build on progress made so far in increasing public awareness of the facts about HIV and AIDS.

96. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many deaths have occurred from AIDS in Britain up to the latest available date.

Mr. Newton: The latest available figures show that, to the end of June this year, a total of 897 deaths of people with AIDS has been reported to the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre and the Communicable Disease (Scotland) Unit.

Low-income Families

50. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what extra help is being provided to families on low incomes as a result of the social security reforms.

Mr. Portillo: Lower paid working families with children can now receive more help through family credit. Non-working families with children, as well as lone parents, disabled people and pensioners get specific additional help through the premiums in the income support scheme.

Overall, this year, we plan to spend an extra £200 million net in weekly income-related benefits on low-income families with children.

Cleveland Child Abuse Inquiry

52. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what the cost of the Cleveland child abuse inquiry will amount to.

64. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what the cost of the Cleveland child abuse inquiry will amount to.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) earlier today.

Social Security Reform

53. Mr. Heffer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the results of the implementation of the recent social security changes.

92. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the results of the implementation of the recent social security changes.

124. Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the results of the implementation of the recent social security changes.

Mr. Portillo: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) earlier today.

140. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is still receiving representations from hon. Members on behalf of their constituents in regard to the changes in social security regulations that commenced operating at the end of March.

Mr. Portillo: Yes.

Drugs (Adverse Reactions)

55. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he proposes to take to improve the monitoring of adverse reactions to medical drugs.

Mr. Newton: The Committee on Safety of Medicines has set in train a number of initiatives to encourage more doctors to report adverse drug reactions and to improve the quality of reporting. These include:

making yellow cards more widely available in prescription pads, the British National Formulary and the ABPI Data Sheet Compendium; making an educational video to increase doctors' awareness of ADRs and the importance of reporting these to the CSM via the yellow card scheme. The video will be made available to the profession next month, and a copy will be placed in the Library;

a series of seminars on adverse reactions held in East Anglia during April to June this year in collaboration with the BMA and the ABPI; publicity in the medical press for the doctor who reported the 200,000th yellow card in June 1988; the "Red Alert" scheme, jointly with the drug safety research unit, to encourage GPs to report serious reactions to new drugs on yellow cards with red triangles. This began last autumn for a trial period; a pilot scheme in three health regions to involve hospital pharmacists in stimulating ADR reporting by hospital doctors;

a pilot scheme, with the Association of Anaesthetists and Faculty of Anaesthetists, to encourage ADR reporting by anaesthetists using a newly designed form. This will start in September this year; a project, in conjunction with the Institute of Dermatologists, to set up a cutaneous reactions database to encourage ADR reporting by dermatologists; plans for a number of lectures to professional bodies by CSM members to mark the 25th anniversary of the yellow card in 1989.

A new improved computer system for adverse reaction monitoring is being designed and will come into use early in 1990.

Health Authorities

56. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make more information available to patients about the performance of individual health authorities.

Mr. Newton: Distric health authorities are responsible for making information available to patients about the performance of local services. Specifically on in-patient and out-patient waiting times, we have asked authorities to draw up local statements of policy which will cover, inter alia, the provision of information to the public on these issues.

Health Service indicators, which are primarily an aid to management, are published annually by the Department for all health authorities in England. A copy is in the Library. Those for 1986-87 were published in April. Health authorities have been asked to carry out an analysis of trends in their indicators for the four years 1983-84 to 1986-87. A commentary will be given to authority members by the end of July, which will also be made available to hon. Members and to community health councils.

108. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to abolish regional health authorities.

Mr. Moore: A number of options have been put forward for reforming the organisation of the NHS. We are looking carefully at these, but no conclusions have yet been reached.

Housing Benefit

58. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people likely to qualify for transitional protection payments in respect of housing benefits.

99. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people likely to qualify for transitional protection payments in respect of housing benefits.

136. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people likely to qualify for transitional protection payments in respect of housing benefit.

Mr. Portillo: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) earlier today.

100. Mr. Millan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications have been received and how many payments have been made by the special unit dealing with transitional protection in respect of housing benefits.

105. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications have been received and how many payments have been made by the special unit dealing with transitional protection in respect of housing benefits.

122. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications have been received and how many payments have been made by the special unit dealing with trasitional protection in respect of housing benefit.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications have been received and how many payments have been made by the special unit dealing with transitional protection in respect of housing benefits.

Mr. Portillo: To date over 50,000 applications have been received. Payments have already been made in a small number of urgent cases and further payments will be made from this week as the necessary information is received from local authorities.

Breastfeeding

59. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the breast-feeding initiative by the National Childbirth Trust and other bodies.

Mrs. Currie: The National Childbirth Trust breastfeeding promotion group, the La Leche League, and the Association of Breastfeeding Mothers are undertaking a joint long term initiative to persuade more mothers to start and maintain breastfeeding. The Government welcome this development, and are contributing more than £100,000 to the initiative over the next two years; the baby milk manufacturers have in addition agreed to contribute £30,000 for this year.

Census (1991)

61. Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last discussed the ethnic question in the 1991 census; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 2 November 1987 at column 573 that the Government are planning to hold a census in April 1991 there have been wide consultations and the topic content of the census has been carefully considered. A White Paper will be published shortly, setting out the Government's proposals.

Dental Services

66. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with leaders of the dental profession on a new National Health Service contract for general dental services; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Government indicated in the White Paper on primary care published last year that they would discuss new arrangements for the remuneration of general dental practitioners with the profession. Officials of the Department have already begun such discussions relating initially to the collection of the necessary information and the technical points which need to be clarified before the start of formal negotiations, which we hope will be later in the year.

Community Care

68. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent represenations he has received on the Griffiths report, "Community Care: Agenda for Action"; and if he will make a statement.

107. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about community care following the publication of the Griffiths report.

114. Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the Griffiths report on community care; what replies he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

132. Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received on the Griffiths report, "Community Care: Agenda for Action"; and if he will make a statement.

134. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received on the Griffiths report, "Community Care: Agenda for Action"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received 102 representations from interested individuals and organisations and will take account of them in framing our own proposals.

Organ Transplantation

69. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the progress of the organ transplantation programme.

Mrs. Currie: According to provisional figures provided by the United Kingdom transplant service, the major rise in organ transplantation is continuing. The number of cadaveric transplants of kidneys, hearts, heart/lungs and livers performed on NHS-entitled patients in the United Kingdom is as follows:

	Number
1 January 1987—30 June 1987	837
1 January 1988—30 June 1988	1,160

These figures reveal an increase of 39 per cent. in the number of transplants carried out. The factors contributing to this splendid achievement are described in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) on 14 June 1988 at columns 156-57.

Doctors, Dentists and Nurses

70. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the ratios of doctors, dentists and nurses per head of population when the National Health Service was founded; and what are the comparable figures for 1978 and 1988.

Mr. Newton: The ratios for NHS staff in 1949, the earliest year for which NHS staffing figures are available, 1978 and 1986 are as follows:

NHS staff in post per 100,000 population[1]
England—at 30 September

	[2]1949	1978	1986
Medical[3]	30·0	75·5	85·9
Dental[3]	1·3	5·5	5·6
Nursing and Midwifery[4]	361·7	752·7	852·2

Private Nursing Homes

73. Mr. Allan Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards health authorities financing out of their budgets private nursing homes within the precincts of National Health Service hospitals.

88. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards health authorities financing out of their budgets private nursing homes within the precincts of National Health Service hospitals.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards health authorities financing out of their budgets private nursing homes within the precincts of National Health Service hospitals.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) earlier today.

Harris Tweed Weavers

76. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will agree to review the position of self-employed Harris Tweed weavers under the new social security arrangements.

Mr. Portillo: The rules for determining claims for income-related benefits by the self-employed are similar to those existing under the previous schemes. Self-employed people may be entitled to income support if they are working less than 24 hours and their income, including any earnings, is insufficient for their needs. Decisions on individual claims are made by independent adjudication officers and these carry the right of appeal to an independent appeal tribunal.

Disablement Benefit

78. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he is giving to the introduction of a system of benefits for disabled people irrespective of how their disability arose.

90. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he is giving to the introduction of a system of benefits for disabled people irrespective of how their disability arose.

106. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he is giving to the introduction of a system of benefits for disabled people irrespective of how their disability arose.

119. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he is giving to the introduction of a system of benefits for disabled people irrespective of how their disability arose.

Mr. Scott: I recently announced in my reply to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 7 June at column 575 that the first report from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on its surveys of disabled people will be published in September and that further reports will follow in 1988 and 1989. As the results of the surveys become available, we shall be considering their implications for benefits for disabled people. This consideration is likely to include the question of different types and rates of benefit for people disabled in different circumstances.

Maternity Units

82. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with chairmen of regional and district health authorities about retaining small, peripheral maternity units.

Mrs. Currie: Maternity services are discussed in the regional ministerial reviews.

In-Patient Treatment (Greater Manchester)

85. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received in-patient treatment at hospitals in Greater Manchester in 1987, and what were the comparable figures for the previous five years.

Mrs. Currie: 1986 is the latest year for which data are available. The information is given in the table.

In-patient cases treated, Greater Manchester District Health Authorities, 1981 to 1986

District Health Authorities	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986

Hospital Building

89. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the progress of the hospital building programme.

Mrs. Currie: Implementation of the programme continues to make good progress. Information held centrally shows that there are currently 504 health building schemes, each costing over £1 million, at various stages of planning, design and construction. During the last year an additional 62 building schemes were completed at locations throughout the country. These new facilities are providing a better health care environment for patients and more attractive and productive working conditions for staff.

116. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many major hospital building schemes have been started and completed since 1978.

Mrs. Currie: Information held centrally shows that 295 health building schemes, each costing over £1 million, have been started and completed since 1978.

131. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many major hospital building schemes are currently under construction.

Mrs. Currie: Information held centrally shows there are currently 133 health building schemes, each costing over £1 million, under construction.

139. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the number of hospital building projects completed since June 1979 and the number planned for construction in the next 10 years.

Mrs. Currie: Information held centrally shows that 316 health building schemes, each costing over £1 million, have been completed since 1979. In addition, there are some 370 schemes currently in planning or design which are forecast to start construction as part of a ten-year rolling programme. New schemes are continually being added to this programme.

Nurse Education

91. Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the future of nurse education.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the timetable for the implementation of Project 2000.

Mr. Newton: The details and timetable for carrying forward Project 2000 are dependent on discussions with the statutory nursing bodies on a range of issues, which we are pursuing. We share the nursing bodies' view that a transition period of about 10 years will be necessary.

Waiting Lists

93. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to improve the flow of information between health authorities on the length of waiting lists.

Mr. Newton: As part of the waiting list initiative we are encouraging health authorities to make better and more up-to-date information about waiting lists and times widely available. This could include improvement to the flow of information between health authorities and will also provide general practitioners with information to help them decide where to refer their patients.

120. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress his Department has made in reducing health services waiting lists over the past five years; and what new plans he has, or is considering, to reduce them further.

Mr. Newton: In the fives years from September 1982 to September 1987 waiting lists have fallen from 726,000 to 662,000 on a comparable basis, a reduction of 9 per cent. This is a reduction of 12 per cent. from the highest ever figure at March 1979.

In 1986 we launched the waiting list initiative, backed by a special waiting list fund of £25 million in 1987-88 and £30 million in 1988-89. Last year health authorities used the fund to treat some 100,000 additional in-patients and day cases and some 40,000 additional out-patients. This year they plan to treat a further 107,000 in-patients/day cases and 80,000 out-patients. Health authorities are also taking vigorous action locally, including setting targets for the reduction of excessive waiting time and developing local statements of policy for out-patient and in-patient waiting times.

The initiative will continue for two more years.

Medical Laboratory Staff

97. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about the pay and working conditions of the medical laboratory scientific officers within the National Health Service.

128. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about the pay and working conditions of the medical laboratory scientific officers within the National Health Service.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about the pay and working conditions of the medical laboratory scientific officers within the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Members to my reply to the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) earlier today.

National Health Service (40th Anniversary)

110. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the 40th anniversary of the National Health Service.

Mr. Moore: The Health Service in England has made remarkable progress over the last 40 years. The health of the population has improved and the Health Service can take much of the credit for the elimination, or virtual elimination, of many once common diseases. Above all, it has been successful in providing access to good quality care regardless of the ability to pay.

In the acute sector there has been massive growth both in activity and in the application of new technology to health care. For example, the number of in-patient cases rose from less than 3 million in 1949 to 6·5 million now. This period saw remarkable changes in the medical and surgical treatment of heart disease across the whole age range. Important advances have also been made in the surgical treatment of elderly people.

Another important example of the progress which has been made is the introduction of organ transplants. We have more patients with a successful kidney transplant than any other country in Europe, and the successful kidney transplant programme was followed in this decade by the development of the heart and liver transplant programme.

These advances in medical treatment have been supported by advances in technology. For example, the introduction of powerful diagnostic tools such as computerised tomography scanning and magnetic resonance imaging has enabled diagnoses to be made which would have been impossible a few years ago.

Advances have not, of course, been limited to the acute sector. Our primary care system is one of the best in the world. The average list size of a GP has now fallen to almost 2,000. However, the most significant change has been in the way GPs work. The rise of group practices and the significant increase in the number of staff working in support of family doctors, has meant that a wider range of services are becoming available to more people. Major changes have also occurred in services for mentally ill, mentally handicapped, elderly and physically disabled people. Progress towards community care has enabled many to live useful and fulfilling lives in the community where once institutional care was the only option.

Improvements in all sectors of health care have been matched by improvements in facilities and premises. There are many new hospitals with modern facilities. The current NHS building programme comprises over 500 major schemes; and last year saw the completion of 62 schemes including the official opening of the new Blood Products Laboratory at Elstree.

In recent years there has been an increasing emphasis on the active promotion of good health and this approach will continue. The more illness can be prevented the more resources will be available to treat these conditions which cannot yet be prevented. Advances are also being made in the early detection of disease by screening. In particular, we are currently developing the first nationwide breast cancer screening service in the world, and we have adopted a similar approach to cervical cancer.

None of these advances could have been achieved without the commitment and dedication of health service staff. Their contribution cannot and should not be under-estimated. For the future, the Government remain firmly committed to a National Health Service which provides high quality health care on the basis of need, not on the ability to pay. Since 1979 the Government have amply demonstrated that commitment by increasing spending on the Health Service to record levels. The Health Service has responded with a vigorous drive for greater efficiency which, backed by additional resources, has enabled more patients to be treated than ever before. The Government are confident that the Health Service can continue to build on these successes by providing services in an effective and efficient way and responding positively to the growing level of consumer awareness. The Government's overall objective for the future of the Health Service is to secure the best possible deal for the public both as taxpayer and consumer.

Social Fund

112. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the operation of the social fund.

Mr. Portillo: The social fund successfully came into operation on 11 April and is providing people with valuable help for exceptional expenses. That is a tribute to the thorough preparations which were made by the staff of the Department. We are placing monthly statistics in the Library which show the position in each local office.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will redistribute social fund budgets between the local offices at Newbury and Oxford.

Mr. Portillo: On 1 July, the local office at Oxford assumed responsibility for serving those residents of Oxfordshire previously served by the local office at Newbury. These were, principally, the inhabitants of Didcot, Grove and Wantage. Accordingly the allocation to Newbury has been reduced proportionately and the money re-allocated to Oxford. The new allocations for the period 11 April 1988-31 March 1989 are as follows:

	Grants budget £	Loans budget £
Newbury	34,902	80,251
Oxford	197,597	461,194

Hepatitis Vaccine

113. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will instruct all district health authorities to issue hepatitis vaccine free of charge to all nursing staff who may be at risk; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The current memorandum from the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation (JCVI), which advises the Health Departments on all aspects of immunisation, recommends that specific groups should be considered for vaccination against hepatitis B. The JCVI has reviewed this guidance and publication is expected shortly.

Elderly Persons (Benefits)

123. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much real spending on benefits for elderly people has changed since 1979.

Mr. Portillo: Total public expenditure on social security benefits for the elderly increased in real terms by 27 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1987-88.

Residential Homes

125. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department's rates for elderly people living in residential homes were last reviewed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: All the limits were reconsidered as part of the last annual process of uprating benefit levels and as a result certain of the income support limits for people in independent residential care and nursing homes were increased on 11 April 1988. This followed a review which took account of a range of information on costs and charges in all categories of homes. The next general uprating of benefits will be in April 1989 and the position of people in homes, including elderly people in residential care homes, will again be considered, taking account of similar factors, in advance of that date. The Department would welcome any fresh information from hon. Members, or other sources, which might assist in that process.

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet reached conclusions following consultation about the level of registration and inspection fees for private residential care homes; and if he has any proposals to change the fees for the registration and inspection of nursing homes.

Mr. Newton: Yes. In the light of the survey carried out by the social services inspectorate and the Welsh Office social work service to establish more clearly the costs of registration and inspection, and of consultation with interested bodies on how best to take account of its findings, regulations have been laid to increase the fees with effect from 1 August 1988. The home registration fee will go up from £550 to £570; the manager registration fee from £100 to £155; the change of owner fee from £550 in some cases and £350 in others to a standard £570; and the annual fee per place from £15 to £28. These increases reflect our policy that authorities should have the means to do the work properly entailed in ensuring acceptable standards through the improved system of registration and inspection introduced under the provisions of the Registered Homes Act 1984.

The increased annual fee per place takes account of the additional requirement, also contained in the new regulations, that homes should be inspected at least twice a year, instead of once as at present. Guidance to local authorities will be that at least one of those inspections should be without notice.

We have also taken the opportunity of the new regulations and guidance to follow up a number of issues identified in Lady Wagner's report. Thus the regulations will now require that registered homes must keep a record showing for each individual resident any money or other valuables received by the home on the resident's behalf, and accounting for its use. The guidance will seek to reinforce existing arrangements to ensure effective complaints procedures, including giving residents information about the role of the local government ombudsman.

Pending the outcome of further steps to obtain more detailed information about the costs of registering and inspecting nursing homes, the fees chargeable in this respect are being increased, also from 1 August 1988, broadly in line with inflation since the present fees were set in April 1986. Regulations have been laid accordingly which provide for the home registration fee to go up from £550 to £600; the change of owner from £350 to £380; the annual fee per bed from £20 to £22; and the annual fee where there are no overnight beds from £175 to £190.

NHS (Pay)

126. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any further plans to introduce regional pay settlements in the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: The offer made by the management side of the Administrative and Clerical Staffs Whitley council on 3 June provided for discussions to continue on restructuring and the introduction of a facility for some local flexibility in pay.

X-ray Equipment

129. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what monitoring of private health service X-ray equipment takes place; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: All users of X-ray equipment are subject to the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and related legislation. The Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985 put a duty upon employers to appoint a radiation protection adviser whose functions include the monitoring of X-ray equipment.

District health authorities have a general responsibility to ensure that medical, surgical and nursing equipment in private nursing homes and hospitals is adequately maintained. As part of this responsibility, they must inspect each establishment at least twice a year.

Society of Perfusionists

130. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the Society of Perfusionists with regard to the status and grading of the profession; if he will agree to meet a deputation from the society; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend recently declined an invitation from a sub-committee of the Society of Perfusionists of Great Britain and Ireland to discuss with them the pay and conditions of service of perfusionists. Negotiations on pay and conditions are matters for the Professional and Technical Staffs B Whitley council.

Income Support

135. Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services on what basis the compensatory element for 20 per cent. of the community charge will be calculated for incorporation in income support rates from April 1989.

Mr. Portillo: Decisions on the level of income support rates for April 1989 will be taken in the autumn.

Cook/Chill System

138. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate of the full cost of implementing the cook/chill system of catering within the Wakefield health authority.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 10 May 1988, at column 85.

Bed Closures

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many beds have been lost in National Health Service hospitals in each year from 1979 to 1987 in each of the constituencies of Hendon South, Mid-Worcestershire, West Lancashire, Fylde, Staffordshire Moorlands and Amber Valley.

Mrs. Currie: The information is not available centrally in precisely the form requested. Details of the number of available beds in the district health authorities wholly or mainly covering the parliamentary constituencies are given in the table. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairmen of the district health authorities who may be able to provide the information relating to the parliamentary constituencies. For completeness, the numbers of in and day patients treated in each health authority are included.

In Vitro Fertilisation

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is now in a position to announce when Government legislation will be introduced setting forth guidelines for the use of in vitro fertilisation and whether discussion is now being undertaken between his Department and the medical professions.

Mr. Newton: We have made clear our intention to introduce legislation during this Parliament. Wide consultation with the medical profession and other interested bodies preceded the publication of the White Paper, "Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation" (Cm. 259) in November last year. Copies of the responses have been placed in the Library.

Meningitis

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of meningitis have been reported in each of the past six months; how many resulted in death; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Meningitis can be caused by a number of different organisms. My hon. Friend may be particularly interested in meningococcal meningitis; data for this plus all forms of acute meningitis are shown in the table. The data are not available in exactly the form requested; notification data for infectious diseases are compiled on a weekly basis, and are shown in the table by approximate monthly period. The data should be regarded as provisional.

(Provisional: to allow for corrected disease notifications and late death registrations)

Social Services Staff (Attacks)

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing for each local authority area in England and Wales the total number of attacks on members of local authority social services departments during the course of their duties, for each year since 1979, with the annual percentage changes;

(2) what consultation has taken place between the Government and professional bodies regarding physical attacks on members of local authority social services departments during the course of their duties;

(3) what steps the Government intends to take to monitor and combat the risks of physical assault faced by social workers in the course of their duties.

Mr. Newton: Information is not held centrally about the numbers of attacks made on employees by clients of local authority social services departments. A departmental advisory committee has reviewed the problem of physical assaults on staff working in the health and personal social services and in the social security organisation. Its findings, with recommendations for action locally, will be published shortly. These will reinforce advice on the prevention and containment of violent incidents provided in 1987 by both the Association of Directors of Social Services and by the Health Services Advisory Committee of the Health and Safety Commission. The major professional interests concerned with social services were represented on the advisory committee and on a consultative group established by the chief inspector of the Department's social services inspectorate.

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing, for each local health authority in England and Wales, the total number of occupational therapists, the number per 1,000 of the population, and the number per 1,000 of the population aged over 65 years, over 75 years and over 85 years.

Mr. Newton: The table shows the number of occupational therapists in each district health authority and the rate per 100,000 population. It would not be meaningful to provide the ratio of staff to population in specific age groups as occupational therapists provide care to patients of all ages. Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Community Care

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to replies on 15 March, Official Report, columns 553-54, what steps he has taken to encourage local authorities to collect data on (a) the discharge and subsequent care of people from long-stay mental illness and mental handicap institutions, (b) the number of carers in their area, (c) the provision of home help support, district nursing services, social work support, or other services to carers and (d) the number of households with a mentally handicapped member and the numbers receiving sitting services, respite care or holiday relief schemes.

Mrs. Currie: The Department has not issued guidance on the collection of such data. It is for local authorities to decide what information they may need in addition to that collected centrally. The range of data to meet central requirements is reviewed regularly within the Department and with local authority representatives at the DHSS/LA technical working group on personal social services statistics.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken to assess whether the execution of National Health Service contracts for laundry and linen services are properly monitored; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) on 1 July at column 394.

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the extent to which competitive tendering in the National Health Service has released resources for patient care; and what areas he identifies for improvement.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on 14 June at column 164. We encourage health authorities to consider the possibility of competitive tendering in any area of their services where this is seen to offer scope for increased efficiency, effectiveness and value for money. Progress is now being made both in going to tender for a package of related services, and also in extending the range of services that have been put out to tender by individual authorities.

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he gives to health authorities, in assessing competitive tenders, to ensure that the costs of in-house National Health Service laundry and linen services are accurately assessed.

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) on 1 July at column 446.

Board and Lodging Regulations

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the working of the board and lodging regulations as they affect young people.

Mr. Portillo: Income support regulations at present provide for all boarders to receive benefit on broadly the same lines as under supplementary benefit legislation with some minor adjustments to align those provisions with the new income support scheme. From April 1989, people in ordinary board and lodging accommodation will be able to claim income support for their living expenses and housing benefit for their accommodation costs in the same way as everyone else in rented accommodation.

Genetic Coding (Infants)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with professors of medicine at Charing Cross hospital and the medical faculty of the university of Leicester concerning records of the genetic coding of infants for purposes of the diagnosis of disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: None.

Geriatric Beds (Oxford RHA)

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many geriatric beds there are per thousand population in each of the Oxford regional health authority districts.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is given in the table.

Postgraduate Medical Education

Mr. David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the outcome of his review of the role and functioning of the Council for Postgraduate Medical Education in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Following the review of its future role by the council itself, and further extensive consultation by officials of the Department, I have concluded that change is needed. On 1 August 1988, therefore, the present Council for Postgraduate Medical Education in England and Wales will be replaced by a new Standing Committee on Postgraduate Medical Education.

The purpose of the standing committee will be to address issues concerned with the practical delivery of high standards of postgraduate medical education. We will be looking to the committee to identify these issues and, drawing on the relevant expertise in the profession, to put forward proposals clearly identifying the action to be taken centrally and locally. The committee's work will complement the advice which we already receive from a number of bodies concerned with medical and dental education, including the medical royal colleges and the education committees of the General Medical Council and the General Dental Council.

The chairman and members of the standing committee will be appointed by my right hon. Friend from recommendations made by the chief medical officer and the chief dental officer, who will seek advice from relevant professional bodies. The first chairman will be professor Dame Barbara Clayton CBE MD PhD FRCP PRCPath; members will be selected so as to cover the widest range of educational, professional and service interests.

The setting up of this new body, after extended consultation with professional and education interests, reflects the Government's commitment to maintaining, and if possible enhancing, the standards of medical education of which this country is justly proud.

Income

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what level of household income is denoted by each decile of the population below 10 per cent., below 20 per cent., below 30 per cent., below 40 per cent., and below 50 per cent., as in tables A1,2,3 and D1,2,3 in 1981, 1983 and 1985 in "Households Below Average Income: A Statistical Analysis".

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 20 June 1988]: As explained in the report of the technical review of the low-income statistics, and in the technical annex to the households below average income statistics, to enable meaningful comparisons, the actual cash incomes received by households are adjusted to reflect varying household size and composition and expressed in terms of individuals in households. National average income per individual, calculated after these adjustments, is shown in the table. The figures therefore provide a basis for comparisons of relative incomes between individual groups and individual years (as in the published tables); but do not provide an indication of the actual cash incomes of the households concerned.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will specify what level of household income is denoted by below 50 per cent., 60 per cent., 70 per cent., 80 per cent., 90 per cent. and 100 per cent. of average income as in tables C1, 2, 3 and F1, 2, 3 in 1981, 1983 and 1985 from "Households Below Average Income: A Statistical Analysis".

General Hospitals

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the number of general hospitals in each district health authority in England and Wales in April 1979, 1983, 1987 and 1988.

Spending Power

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish tables showing, on the same basis as those given in the answer of 16 June to the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall), Official Report, columns 283-87, information using expenditure and benefit figures appropriate for families in Kensington.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 18 June 1988]: The information requested is set out in the tables. They compare the post-reform position in April 1988 not with an actual pre-reform cash situation but with a hypothetical position which might have occurred, had the previous structure continued and been uprated on the assumptions in "Impact of the Reformed Structure of Income Related Benefits" (October 1987).

In addition, it should be noted that, although the comparisons are based on average local authority housing charges in Kensington and Chelsea, they do not necessarily reflect either the wide variety of rents and domestic rates that people in the borough actually pay or real families' circumstances and their housing arrangements. Finally, the comparisons take no account of the housing benefit transitional cash protection announced on 27 April.

It should be noted that water service charges of £1·78 have been removed from both the pre and post-reform tables. Under income support, water charges are treated like any other item of domestic expenditure.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish his estimate of the unemployment figures for each month since January 1982 on an unchanged benefits basis.

Mr. Lee: This information is available in the Library. The table shows seasonally adjusted unemployed claimants, excluding school-leavers, in the United Kingdom for each month from January 1982 to May 1988. This series is consistent with current rules allowing for all significant changes in coverage.

Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to lay before the House the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations.

Mr. Nicholls: The regulations will be laid after they have been fully considered by the Government. I expect this to be before this end of the year.

Tourism

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the comparable amount of resources expended in 1987 by his Department and national tourist organisations in promoting London and the peripheral regions overseas; and what action he is taking to promote an open jaws policy where only one end of a journey is through the London airport system.

Mr. Lee: Government promotion overseas of London and the peripheral regions is directed through the British Tourist Authority (BTA). In 1987-88 the BTA spent about £5·8 million (27 per cent. of total overseas marketing spend) on promotion of the areas covered by the London, South-East, Southern, East Anglia and Thames and Chilterns regional tourist boards. Airports are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. However, my Department encourages tourists to visit attractions throughout Britain and so to use whichever airport seems most appropriate for their journey.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will indicate what priority his Department's policy on tourism places on the dispersal of tourist activity to the regions; what specific initiatives his Department is taking to realise this objective; what priority is placed on the development of the regional airports, and Manchester airport in particular, as part of his Department's tourism policy to realise this objective; what discussions he is having with national tourist organisations; and what assessment he has made of the implications of continued heavy promotion overseas of London for the scope for reducing the burdens already carried by the capital as a tourist centre.

Mr. Lee: My Department places a high priority on encouraging tourist activity throughout the country, and this is a major objective for both the English Tourist Board and the British Tourist Authority.

The network of regional tourist boards is organised to stimulate tourist activity in the regions, in conjunction with the English Tourist Board which has developed specific initiatives to assist with this, including tourist development action programmes, strategic development initiatives and the inner cities initiative.

Regional airports remain the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. However, the Government remain committed to the 1985 airports White Paper policy of encouraging the maximum use of all regional airports.

I have regular discussions with national tourist organisations on a variety of topics.

London is marketed abroad as one of the many attractions that Britain has to offer. However, I am confident that, with 60 per cent. of overseas visitors already spending nights outside London, the spread of tourism throughout the country will continue.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of air traffic handled in 1987 at London was attributable to inward tourists; to what extent that proportion is expected to increase by 1990, 1995 and 2000; what approximate level of increases in bed spaces in each of those years will be required in London to accommodate these figures; and what discussions he is having with national tourist organisations and others about London's ability to absorb further increases in tourist numbers, in the light of the existing burden on the capital as a tourist centre.

Mr. Lee: In 1987, 42 per cent. of air traffic handled in London was attributable to inward tourists. Forward projections for the years 1990, 1995 and 2000 are not available. The London Tourist Board estimates 20,000 extra hotel rooms will be needed by the year 2000. I have regular discussions with the national tourist boards and others on a variety of topics. Last year the London tourist board and the Joint London Tourism Forum published its tourism strategy for London, which sets out objectives designed to ensure that London continues to play its part in attracting visitors.

Fairgrounds

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) prohibition and (b) improvement notices under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act have been issued regarding fairgrounds for each year since 1979 to the most recent practicable date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The information for 1979 and 1980 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The number of notices issued since 1981 is as follows:

Year	Prohibition notices	Improvement notices
1981	3	4
1982	7	1
1983	5	7
1984	29	16

Year	Prohibition notices	Improvement notices
1985	17	11
[1]1986-87	12	5
[2]1987-88	7	11

[1] Period covers 1 January 1986 to 31 March 1987.
[2] Period covers 1 April 1987 to 31 March 1988.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many specialist inspectors to inspect fairgrounds are employed by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Nicholls: Fairgrounds are inspected by factory inspectors, who are supported as required by specialist inspectors from the technology division. No specialist inspectors are devoted solely to the inspection of fairgrounds.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to require an inspection by Health and Safety Executive inspectors at all mobile fairgrounds prior to opening to the public on every occasion when a fair is erected, including scrutiny of machinery, public access to exhibits and rides, handrails, steps and lighting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: It is not intended to introduce legislation at this time to deal with fairgrounds, whether mobile or permanent. The general provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974, particularly sections 2, 3, 4 and 6, apply as they do to all other industries and are relevant to these matters. For fairgrounds these general provisions of the Act are supplemented by the code of safe practice at fairs, published in 1984, and by its newly published technical annex; these have the general support of the main representative bodies in the industry, as well as the Health and Safety Executive.

The 1984 code requires in particular that an inspection of each passenger-carrying amusement device should be carried out every day by the ride owner before it is made available for the public, and that records of these inspections should be kept. Other provisions deal with public access and with lighting, among other matters.

HSE inspectors visit fairgrounds periodically to monitor compliance with the Health and Safety at Work etc Act and with the code of safe practice, including those provisions to which I have referred. Where necessary, they use the powers available to them under the Act in order to secure improvements.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of general and specialist inspectors at the Health and Safety Executive for each year from 1975 to the most recent practicable date.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is as follows:

1 April	[1]General inspectors	[1]Specialist inspectors
1976	624	191·5
1977	676·5	206
1978	695·5	229
1979	742	224
1980	759	235
1981	735	228
1982	678	221
1983	654	213
1984	627	213
1985	652	208
1986	[2]623	220
1987	[2]621·5	227
[3]1988	[2]596	211

[1] Figures relate to factory inspectors, plus a small number of explosives inspectors (all specialists), in the Health and Safety Executive.
[2] Before April 1986 some inspectors now classed as specialists were categorised as general inspectors.

Tourism Signs

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of signs erected since the publication of new tourism signs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Signposting is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I understand, however, that good progress continues to be made: 16,000 signs in England and Wales have now been approved and 5,000 signs have been erected.

Hotels (Crown Classification Scheme)

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the results of any consumer research regarding public understanding of the crown classification scheme for hotels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: In 1987 the English Tourist Board (ETB) commissioned a survey of public understanding of the crown scheme. The research was undertaken by MaS Research Ltd. in the last two weeks of March 1987. The results showed that, of a total sample of 4,759 people interviewed, 3 per cent. recognised the crown symbol, and 4 per cent. were aware that the ETB had a rating system for hotels. However, the survey was carried out less than three months after the public launch of the scheme.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Harmonisation

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when a consultative document on direct tax harmonisation within the European Community is to be published.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The European Commission has not yet published its draft proposals for harmonisation of the business tax base. If in due course these are communicated formally to the Council of Ministers we will then consider how to proceed.

Corporation Tax

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to discuss with other European Finance Ministers any proposals to introduce reciprocal arrangements throughout the European Community to allow companies to set advance corporation tax against their tax liabilities arising in other European countries.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have at present no plans to do so.

Income Tax

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the effects of income tax cuts since 1979 on the regions of the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am not aware of any recent representations on this point. The income tax cuts we have achieved since 1979 will provide a stimulus to enterprise and initiative in all regions of the country.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of taxpayers in (a) England, (b) Scotland, and (c) Wales pay income tax in the highest band.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The latest available information by country is for 1985-86. In that year the following percentages of single people and married couples liable to tax were liable at (i) a higher rate, (ii) the highest rate of income tax: England (i) 5·0 per cent., (ii) 0·6 per cent.; Scotland (i) 4·3 per cent., (ii) 0·3 per cent.; Wales (i) 3·4 per cent., (ii) 0·2 per cent. Members of Her Majesty's forces and the Merchant Navy are excluded.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the cost to Her Majesty's Stationery Office of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Brooke: The cost for each financial year is assessed as being:

Year	£
1983-84	70,000
1984-85	150,000
1985-86	400,000
1986-87	550,000
1987-88	400,000

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in Her Majesty's Stationery Office as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Brooke: The following is the information requested:

Company	Assignment
Touche Ross	Supply Computer Project
Price Waterhouse	CAPO Computer Project
Binder Hamlyn	Accounting systems upgrade
David Harris Associates	Financial consultancy
Management Partners	Marketing advice

Net Overseas Assets

96. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the most recently available figures for Britain's net overseas assets.

Mr. Major: The United Kingdom's net overseas assets were estimated at some £90 billion at end-1987, second only to those of Japan.

Value Added Tax

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review the default surcharge and the effect it has had on the receipts of value added tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: The Government, in accordance with the announcement in May 1986 in their White Paper—"Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers"—reviewed the operation of the default surcharge provisions before the 1988 Budget.

It was apparent from that review that the default surcharge had not been in operation long enough for significant conclusions to be drawn. A further review of the impact and operation of the surcharge is now to be made and trade and other interested bodies are invited to contribute.

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review the rules for relief from value added tax on bad debts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: The Government announced in May 1986 in their White Paper—"Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers"—that a review of the arrangements for value added tax relief on bad debts would take place within two years. That review has now begun and trade and other interested bodies are invited to contribute.

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the proposed penalty for persistent value added tax misdeclaration will be applied automatically; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: This new penalty provision replaces the previous automatic third test for the serious misdeclaration penalty provided for in section 14 of the Finance Act 1985. It will not be automatically applied. When the thresholds of £100 or 1 per cent. are exceeded Customs will first consider whether the nature of the errors justifies the issue of a warning letter, or the imposition of a penalty. In no circumstances will a penalty be imposed without the case first being referred to Customs' head office. It will only be imposed on the most careless traders who persist in making significant errors even after receiving a formal written warning. The application of this new penalty will be closely monitored and kept under review.

Funeral Services (VAT)

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy that essential funeral services will continue to be exempted from value added tax.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 July 1988]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has no plans for changes in this area.

Oyston Estates Agency Ltd.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether all investigations into the tax affairs of Oyston Estates Agency Ltd. and related companies by the Inland Revenue are complete.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 11 July 1988]: Confidentiality precludes the Inland Revenue from commenting on the tax affairs of any particular company.

Rating Reform

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidance he has given, or intends to give, to the Inland Revenue in the current revaluation of non-domestic premises in England and Wales prior to the introduction of the non-domestic rate in 1990; and if he will make it his policy to ensure that the seasonal nature of trade in holiday areas is taken into account in fixing new valuations.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The chief valuer's office is responsible for giving guidance to valuation officers in the compilation of valuation lists. Rating assessments are based on rental values; accordingly, in areas where the seasonal nature of trade has an effect on rental values, this will be reflected in the rating assessments.

Private Medical Insurance

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate, for each of the last five years, the cost of providing tax relief on private medical insurance (a) throughout the United Kingdom, and (b) in Scotland;

(2) what was the estimated cost to the Treasury of relief to (a) companies, (b) employees, (c) self-employed, and (d) other sources in each of the last five years, as a result of contributions to private health care premiums, in (i) the United Kingdom, and (ii) Scotland.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answers 28 June 1988]: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the costs of extending income tax relief to all private medical insurance premiums. Under present legislation, relief is available only on premiums paid by employers on behalf of employees whose earned income, including the value of benefits, is less than £8,500 per year. The cost of this relief is about £10 million per year in the United Kingdom and about £1 million in Scotland.

The estimated direct revenue cost of giving relief on all premiums, based on present levels of contributions, is about £240 million, of which about £10 million would be incurred in Scotland. These estimates make no allowance for any behavioural changes.

Estates (Inheritance)

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the number of estates valued at (a) £0·5 million to £1·0 million and (b) over £1 million which were inherited free of inheritance tax in each year between 1978-79 and 1987-88 with projection for 1988-89.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 27 June 1988]: Comprehensive information is available only for years to 1985-86 and refers to numbers of estates where the net assets of the estate were within the requested ranges. These were as follows:

	£0·5 million to £1·0 million	Over £1 million
1978-79	23	11
1979-80	32	7
1980-81	53	18
1981-82	54	13
1982-83	61	18
1983-84	155	31
1984-85	143	32
1985-86	152	53

CIVIL SERVICE

Staff Dismissals

Mr. Holt: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list, for each grade, the number of civil servants dismissed for any reason, during each of the past nine years.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply.

I am writing to my hon. Friend with the information requested, and will arrange for a copy to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's current role in promoting the development of infrastructure projects associated with the construction of the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have responsibility for approving proposals from British Rail for railway infrastructure investment in connection with the tunnel. I have already approved in principle a package of investment proposed by the board not exceeding £550 million in total to enable Channel tunnel rail services to commence in 1993. Under section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987, the board is required to publish a plan by the end of 1989 setting out its proposals for international through services beyond London and the associated infrastructure investment. The board is this week publishing its report on the need for additional rail capacity in the longer-term between London and the tunnel.

We have direct responsibility for motorways and other trunk roads. A number of major trunk road improvements are programmed, in particular on the M20/A20 and A259 routes. The trunk road programme is kept under review, and schemes are added as the need is identified. We also support local authority road improvements on roads of more than local importance with transport supplementary grant (TSG). Kent county council is receiving TSG for schemes made necessary by the tunnel in addition to its main accepted road programme.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received from the British Railways Board its report on rail capacity between London and the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: I received the report on Monday 11 July. I understand from BR that it will be published on Thursday 14 July, and that BR will be sending copies to all hon. Members. Copies will also be placed in the Library of the House.

Bridges

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report, for the last two years, all local authority bids to his Department for bridge maintenance work, together with the grants finally provided by his Department.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Local authority bridge maintenance work is generally classed as current expenditure. Support is provided within the rate support grant mechanism. It is not the subject of specific bids. Bids for transport supplementary grant (TSG) are made for some capital expenditure on bridges. Where TSG is paid it will generally be towards a block of eligible expenditure within which individual bridgeworks are not separately identifiable.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what basis with regard to enstimated times of arrival of emergency services to the scene of accidents involving the transportation of nuclear waste, safety procedures for dealing with such accidents are framed.

Mr. David Mitchell: The emergency services would reach the scene of an accident in less than half an hour and would then if necssary be able to summon expert radiological assistance.

There has been no accident involving the tranport of irradiated nuclear fuel which resulted in any release of the radioactive contents.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The cost of employing management and computer consultants for each financial year from 1984 to 1987 was:

	£ million
1984-85	0·980
1985-86	1·254
1986-87	1·847
1987-88	2·195

Information for 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not held centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Traffic Flows (London)

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement on the methods available to his Department for measuring traffic flows in London;

(2) if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) of 16 May, Official Report, column 360, he will publish the information contained in the table for each borough individually; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on traffic flows in London and on the data collection methods used is given in the Department's statistics bulletin (87) 37 "London traffic monitoring report for 1986". Copies are in the Library.

Estimates of average traffic speeds in the individual boroughs during the period 1983 to 1986 are given in tables A2 to A4. Information for earlier years was published by the Greater London council in its "Traffic Monitoring Review 1984". I have placed copies of the relevant tables from this publication in the Library.

PSV Driving Tests

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the current period of delay between date of application and dates offered for a test by those currently applying for PSV driving tests in each traffic area, and the national average.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not readily available. The period includes assessment of a candidate's suitability to hold a PSV licence. The time taken to complete checks on health and character can vary considerably.

The Department aims to provide a test within four weeks of a positive decision on suitability. Waiting periods for HGV and PSV driving tests are overall still rather longer than we would wish. Steps are being taken to reduce them.

If my hon. Friend has knowledge of any specific problem perhaps he would let me have details.

Roads (London)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take immediate steps to publish in full the four recently completed consultants' reports on road and traffic proposals for London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is wrong to say the consultants have completed reports.

Nearly three weeks ago, on 23 June, at column 637, I stated that the working papers would be placed in the Library and that the consultants would discuss options with the boroughs participating in the studies.

There is a wrong report in today's Guardian that the public cannot have the consultants' working papers.

Over two weeks ago, on 27 June, at column 122, I stated that the working papers can be purchased from the consultants.

I refer the hon. Member to the consultants' stage 1 reports published in December 1986, the terms of reference for stage 2 published in July 1987 and the objectives of the studies developed in discussion with boroughs.

London Assessment Studies

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what objectives have been set for the London assessment studies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We developed the following objectives in consultation with the boroughs concerned and their associations.

1. TO PROMOTE ACCESSIBILITY

1.1 To increase opportunities for all people to gain access to employment, places and services and to improve ease of access to them.[3]

1.2 To provide or promote adequate access from the study areas to national transport systems.[4]

2. TO SUPPORT EMPLOYMENT ECONOMIC GROWTH AND REGENERATION

2.1 To support policies for employment, economic growth and regeneration particularly for inner city areas.[5]

3. TO DEVELOP AN EFFICIENT TRANSPORT SYSTEM

3.1 To encourage greater efficiency in the use of transport in London whilst still allowing freedom of choice.[2]

3.2 To provide or promote transport infrastructure and management which achieves adequate return on investment.[6]

3.3 To reduce congestion costs to industry and commerce, including public transport.

4. TO IMPROVE THE ENVIRONMENT

4.1 To keep car traffic entering central London to a manageable level.

4.2 To conserve and improve the quality of the environment.[7]

4.3 To provide opportunity for removing traffic, particularly heavy lorries, from unsuitable roads.

4.4 To provide relief to shopping areas and residential streets.

4.5 To improve the condition and appearance of existing roads, and to ensure any new infrastructure is designed with sensitivity for the environment.

5. TO ENHANCE SAFETY FOR TRAVELLERS

5.1 To improve the safety and personal security of all travellers within the transport system.[8 9]

5.2 To identify locations with high accident rates and to take action to improve safety.

Note:

1. The studies will develop options designed inter alia to meet these objectives and the views of the public will be taken into acount in reaching decisions on them.

[2] It should be noted that these objectives cannot be considered individually, they need to be considered together. For example freedom of choice should not be regarded as an absolute condition and will be assessed as it relates to the other objectives.

[3] Regard will be given to the provision of transport, to meet the needs of different groups of travellers and potential travellers and to its contribution to the improvement of opportunities for groups and individuals in the community suffering transport disadvantage.

[4] Objective 1.2—'national transport systems' includes those sections in other parts of London. Accessibility will be considered in relation to the Secretary of State's general responsibility for transport.

[5] 'Policies' includes approved central and local government plans and guidance by the Secretary of State for the Environment, taking into account advice by SERPLAN and LPAC.

[6] Provision of infrastructure and management for private and public transport will be assessed on a comparable basis.

[7] 'Environmental factors' include noise, pollution, visual impact, severance, townscape, ecology.

[8] 'All travellers' include cyclists, pedestrians and users of public transport and private vehicles.

[9] Objective 5.1 includes the need to design facilities to minimise the risk of harassment.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Loans

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries that have had their aid loans cancelled by the United Kingdom Government since 1983 (a) by date of loan, (b) by name of country, (c) by amount of loan and (d) by date of cancellation.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

Country	Date cancellation agreement signed	Original loans cancelled
		Date of loan	Original value (£ millions)	Amount waived (principal + interest) (£ millions)
Mozambique	October 1983	1976	5·000	5·000

[1] Agreements were signed with each member country (Uganda in July, Kenya in August and Tanzania in October).
[2] Entry covers two related loans which were subsequently treated as one.
[3] Entry covers five related loans which were subsequently treated as one.

In addition, an agreement is due to be signed during 1988 with Senegal which will waive £1·071 million (interest and principal) on a loan of original value £1·000 million.

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries that have negotiated with the United Kingdom Government better rescheduling terms for their aid loans since 1983 (a) by date of orginal loan, (b) by name of country, (c) by amount of orginal loan, (d) the orginal terms for repayment and (e) the revised terms for repayment.

Mr. Chris Patten: Following agreement in the Paris club certain payments of principal and interest due in respect of past aid loans have been rescheduled. The information on such rescheduling since 1983 is as follows:

	Rescheduling loans: Terms					Original loans covered by the rescheduling loans: Terms

[1] These loans cover payments from two separate periods of the same original loan.
[2] These loans cover payments from three separate periods of the same eight original loans.
[3] These loans cover payments from two separate periods of the same four original loans.
[4] These loans cover payments from two separate periods of both the orginal four loans and the two 1983 rescheduling loans.

Following recent agreements in the Paris club, the Government are at present negotiating bilateral rescheduling agreements with Costa Rica, Brazil, Ecuador, Cote d'Ivoire, Nigeria and the Philippines.

Mekong River Basin

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the extent of participation by Her Majesty's Government in the United Nations project for the Mekong river basin; what proposals are being discussed for the resumption of the original programme; and if he will now reappraise the opportunities offered by that project in the light of recent changes in the area.

Mr. Chris Patten: We expect to spend about £100,000 in the current financial year in support of two projects managed by the interim Mekong committee. While there has been no attempt as yet to reconstitute the full committee, we are monitoring current political developments closely.

SCOTLAND

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing for each health board area in Scotland the total number of occupational therapists, the number per 1,000 of the population and the number per 1,000 of the population aged over 65 years, over 75 years and over 85 years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The table below sets out for each health board area in Scotland at 30 September 1987, the whole-time equivalent number of occupational therapists in post broken down into the categories as set out in the question. The figures given relate to occupational therapists employed by health boards only and do not include those employed by local authorities.

Privatisation

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement outlining his plans to privatise the historic buildings directorate and the Registrar's Department; what consultations he has had with interested parties; and what time scale is proposed to implement the plans.

Mr. Rifkind: I have no plans to privatise the historic buildings and monuments directorate of the Scottish Development Department or the Department of the Registers for Scotland (DRS). I did, however, decide that HBMD and DRS should be candidates for agency status under the next steps initiative announced by the Prime Minister on 18 February and the two trade union sides concerned were so informed on 29 April. Detailed proposals are now being drawn up and full consultations with the trade union side have been promised. No decision has yet been taken that either HBMD or DRS will become an agency; there is accordingly no time scale at present for implementation.

Nurses (Psychiatric Qualifications)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses there are currently employed by the National Health Service in Scotland who are qualified in psychiatric nursing; and if he will give the comparable figure for each of the last five years for which information is available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not held centrally in precisely the form requested. The available information, which relates to the whole time equivalent number of qualified nurses working in the specialties of mental illness and mental handicap, is set out.

Psychiatric Hospitals

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many psychiatric hospitals there are in Scotland; and how many beds there are in each of them.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: For statistical purposes psychiatric hospitals are customarily taken to include mental hospitals, psychiatric units in general hospitals and mental handicap hospitals. In the year ending 30 September 1987 there were 30 mental hospitals, 28 psychiatric units in general hospitals and 16 mental handicap hospitals in Scotland. The average available staffed beds in each is given in the table.

Rates

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland paid rates (a) before and, (b) after 1 April 1988.

Mr. Lang: At 1 April 1987 rates were payable in respect of approximately 2 million domestic and non-domestic subjects in Scotland. A corresponding figure for 1 April 1988 is not yet available.

Sewage

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report, for each local authority in Scotland responsible for sewage disposal, each sewage outfall which discharges directly into the sea, showing (a) how far into the sea the outfall pipe travels before discharge, (b) how much sewage each year is discharged, (c) whether the discharge is of treated or untreated sewage and (d) the proximity of the nearest public bathing beaches to the sewage outfall.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are some 1,600 local sewage outfalls in Scotland, just over half of which discharge directly to estuaries or to the sea. The detail sought is too lengthy for inclusion in the Official Report. However, a summary of much of this information is contained in a technical report "Sewage Works and Discharges Archive Report 1987" produced by the Scottish Development Department and I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library.

For the location of bathing waters identified in terms of the EC bathing water directive, I refer the hon. Member to my written answer of 29 June to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, (Sir H. Monro) at column 247.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report those sewage authorities who regularly dump sewage at sea, indicating (a) the areas permitted for dumping purposes, (b) the volumes and types of sewage dumped and (c) the proximity of the nearest public bathing beaches to the dumped sewage.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Lothian regional council is licensed to dump annually a total of 500,000 metric tonnes wet weight of sewage sludge containing not more than 25,000 metric tonnes of dry solids at sites off Bell Rock and St. Abbs Head which is defined as within 1½ nautical mile radius of centre co-ordinates 56° 25′ N 02° 10′ W and 56° 04·5′ N 02° 07·25′ W respectively. Dumping alternates between each site every six months.

Strathclyde regional council is licensed to dump annually a total of 1,800,000 metric tonnes wet weight of sewage sludge containing not more than 90,000 metric tonnes of dry solids at Garnock Head dumping ground which is defined as within ½ nautical mile radius of centre co-ordinates 55° 39·8′ N 05° 00·8′ W.

In the Firth of Clyde the water at Saltcoats/Ardrossan lies closest to the licensed dump site. In the Firth of Forth the water at Dunbar lies nearest. Both waters meet the standards of the EC directive.

WALES

Hospitals (Gwent)

Sir John Stradling Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all the hospitals in the area of the Gwent health authority, with the average number of both patients and staff for each of them in each of the last 12 years.

Mr. Grist: The information can be provided only at disproportionate cost. My hon. Friend may, however, wish to refer to the following Welsh Office publications, copies of which are held in the Library of the House. "Bed Use Statistics" (which includes annual numbers of in-patients, day cases and out-patients by hospital) and "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for Wales" (which provides a manpower summary for each district health authority).

Ciliau Moor Common (Slurry Tank)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 30 June, to the hon. Member for Caerphilly, why his Department does not have a record of the builders of the slurry tank on Ciliau Moor common; if he will take steps to find out who the builders were; when construction of the slurry tank on Ciliau Moor common was completed; and if he will summarise the views of the Open Space Society and the Countryside Commission in their replies to him concerning the construction of a slurry tank on Ciliau Moor common.

Mr. Grist: The Welsh Office has no practical need to have on record either the name of the contractor who undertook these private building works or the date of their completion. It is not the practice of the Department to publicise or summarise views expressed by bodies consulted on developments on common land.

Valleys Programme

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether Bedwas, Machen, and Maesycummer, Mid Glamorgan, are included within the boundaries of the area defined for the purposes of his recently announced valleys programme.

Mr. Peter Walker: Maesycummer is within the area covered by the new valleys programme. Bedwas and Machen are outside.

Green Belt

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by county the area of land designated as green belt up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There are no statutory green belts in Wales.

Waste Tipping

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will call a conference of local authorities in Wales to discuss and monitor the tipping of poisonous and industrial waste from overseas in quarries and other similar locations in Wales; if he will draw up and publish a register of licensed tipping locations entitled to receive poisonous and industrial wastes; if he will consult the appropriate local planning authorities to devise a 24-hour monitoring of tipping sites to ensure that the appropriate regulations are adhered to; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Regular meetings, instituted with the support of the Welsh Office, are held by the waste disposal authorities in Wales to discuss any matters relating to waste disposal.

Each wast disposal authority is required by statute to maintain a public register containing copies of all waste disposal licences.

Arrangements for the supervision of the operation of licensed waste disposal sites are the responsibility of the appropriate waste disposal authority.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of those companies in the United Kingdom who trade in the tipping of contaminated soils, industrial waste and poisonous by products and who tip at locations in Wales; if he will list those ports in Wales through which contaminated wastes from overseas are imported; what steps are taken to ensure that at these ports of entry there s sifficient professional inspection of both the substances and the ships' documents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Information on companies trading in wastes is not maintained centrally and information on waste imports is not maintained in the form requested. In 1986-87 special waste was imported through the ports of Newport, Holyhead, Briton Ferry and Fishguard.

In relation to contaminated soil, plant health legislation prohibits imports from outside Europe. Soil from European countries must be accompanied by a phytosanitary certificate signed by the plant health authority in the exporting country, confirming freedom from pests and disease, without which customs officials will not permit consignments to enter the United Kingdom. In relation to special wastes, it is the responsibility of the waste disposal authority in the area of which the waste enters the country, to ensure that the waste is disposed of at appropriately licensed sites.

Consumer Protection

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will increase financial resources to local authorities to allow greater involvement of trading standards officers and departments in supporting the community with advice and assistance and fairly enforcing trading laws and consumer protection measures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The rate support grant for Wales includes an element for the local authority trading standards service. This provides adequate resources for the enforcement of trading standards and consumer protection legislation.

I have no plans to amend the 1988-89 rate support grant provision which allowed for a nominal increase in consumer protection provision over the previous year of 7·4 per cent. My proposals for local authority relevant expenditure and grant in 1989-90 were announced to Parliament on 7 July. My view of service priorities for 1989-90 will be formally set out in the rate support grant report to be published later in the year. It is, however, entirely for local authorities to allocate block grant to particular services in accordance with their own priorities.

In addition, the Department of Trade and Industry funds the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux which provides the necessary support services for local citizens advice bureaux in England and Wales. Citizens advice bureaux, most of which receive financial support from local authorities, provide advice and assistance to local communities throughout Wales. I see no reason to alter these well established arrangements.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General on how many occasions since 1979 the British Government have been subject to legal challenge in courts in the United Kingdom or in Europe on account of alleged breaches of the European convention on human rights; and if he will list in each case the substance of the alleged breach and the outcome of any legal proceedings.

The Attorney-General: The European convention on human rights is not part of the law of the United Kingdom; an allegation of a breach of the convention's provisions cannot therefore found a cause of action in the courts of this country. The European court of human rights has delivered 22 judgments since 1979 in cases concerning the United Kingdom (excluding article 50 judgments, which concern damages and costs), of which the details are as set out:

Date of judgment	Name of case: subject matter	Outcome
13 August 1981	Young, James and Webster (closed shop)	Breach of Article 11.
22 October 1981	Dudgeon (homosexuality: Northern Ireland)	Breach of Article 8.
5 November 1981	X (mental patient: right to have detention reviewed)	No breach of Article 5(1). Breach of Article 5(4).
25 February 1982	Campbell and Cosans (corporal punishment in state schools: respect for parents' philosophical convictions)	No breach of Article 3. Breach of Article 2 of Protocol No. 1.
25 March 1983	Silver (prisoners' correspondence)	Breach of Articles 6(1), 8 and 13.

Date of judgment	Name of case: subject matter	Outcome
28 June 1984	Campbell and Fell (prison visitors; conduct of disciplinary proceedings)	Breach of Article 6 in two respects and of Articles 8 and 13. No breach of Article 6 on the other points at issue.
2 August 1984	Malone (telephone tapping)	Breach of Article 8.
28 May 1985	Ashingdane (detention of mental patient)	No breach of Article 5(1), 5(4) or 6.
28 May 1985	Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali (immigration: discrimination on grounds of sex)	Breach of Articles 13 and 14 in one respect. No other breach of Article 13 or 14. No breach of Article 3 or 8.
21 February 1986	James (leasehold reform)	No breach of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1, or of Articles 6(1) and 13.
8 July 1986	Lithgow (aircraft and shipbuilding nationalisation)	No breach of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1, or of Article 14, 6(1) or 13.
17 October 1986	Rees (transsexual)	No breach of Article 8 or 12.
26 October 1986	AGOSI (forfeiture by customs)	No breach of Article 1 of Protocol No. 1.
24 November 1986	Gillow	Breach of Article 8 in one respect. No breach of Article 8 in other respects, or of Article 6 or 14.
2 March 1987	Weeks (parole)	No breach of Article 5(1). Breach of Article 5(4).
2 March 1987	Monnell and Morris (criminal appeals)	No breach of Article 5(1), 6(1), 6(3)(c) or 14.
8 July 1987	O (child care)	Breach of Article 6(1). No breach of Article 8.
8 July 1987	H, W, B, R (child care)	Breach of Articles 6(1) and 8.
27 April 1988	Boyle and Rice (prisoners' correspondence and visits)	No breach of Article 13. Breach of Article 8 in respect of one letter.

Lonrho plc

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General when the Crown Prosecution Service received from the City of London police the papers relating to the Liechtenstein subsidiaries of Lonrho plc, Blorg and Contango.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions first received papers from the City of London police in August 1986. He concluded that no further action was called for, a view which was shared by the then Attorney-General. Further papers have been submitted to the Director by the police and others on a number of occasions since. The Director has found no reason to depart from the conclusion reached in 1986.

Judicial Studies Board

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) 28 October, Official Report, column 272, whether he has any proposals to change the criteria for selection of appointees to the Judicial Studies Board.

The Attorney-General: No.

Land Registry

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Attorney-General what, by grade, is the current establishment at Her Majesty's Land Registry, Gloucester; how this has varied in each of the last three years; and how many officers have been in place against establishment in each of the past three years.

The Attorney-General [pursuant to his reply, 30 June 1988, c. 293-94]: Additional information classified by grades is as set out in the tables.

Mr. Dermot Purdy

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General when the Crown Solicitor for Northern Ireland expects to have completed his work regarding the superannuation case of Mr. Dermot Purdy, 11A Stockbridge road, Donaghadee; and when he will be in a position to have the case listed in court.

Dr. Mawhinney: I have been asked to reply.

While Mr. Purdy's solicitors have been in correspondence with the Crown Solicitor, no proceedings have been instituted by or on behalf of Mr. Purdy. If such proceedings were to be commenced the listing of the case in court would be a matter for Mr. Purdy's solicitors.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Careless Driving

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drivers have been (a) cautioned, (b) prosecuted and (c) convicted for driving without due care and attention in Nottinghamshire, London and the north-west; and if he will express these figures as a proportion per 10,000 drivers in the said area, for each of the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is for 1983 to 1986 and is shown in the table. Information collected centrally on written warnings does not distinguish the specific offence of driving without due care and attention from other offences of careless driving etc. with which it is grouped. Figures for proceedings and findings of guilt for this specific offence, which form the vast majority of the offences in this group, could be broken down by police force area only at disproportionate cost. The figures are related to the home population of the police force area concerned although the offenders may not have been resident in the area; information on the number of drivers in each area is not available.

Driving Offences

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the distribution by sex of drink-driving offenders;

(2) what is the distribution by sex of offenders convicted of driving without due care and attention

Mr. John Patten: In 1986, 95 per cent. of those found guilty of driving and so on after consuming alcohol or taking drugs were males, and for careless driving and so on 86 per cent. Information on the age and sex of offenders is published annually, by broad offence group in a Home Office statistical bulletin "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales". Table 8 of the issue for 1986, number 36/87 is the latest available and copies of this bulletin are in the Library. The offence of driving without due care and attention is grouped together with other offences of careless driving and so on, and findings of guilt for this specific offence, which forms the vast majority of the offences in the careless driving category, could be broken down by sex of offender only at disproportionate cost. The figures for 1987 will be published later this year.

Drivers (Retests)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions magistrates' courts have used their power to oblige a driving offender to take a retest; and what information his Department possesses on the ages and physical states of the said offenders, for each of the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: In 1987, about 600 disqualifications were imposed by magistrates' courts, where there was also a requirement for the offender to take a driving test. This information is published annually by broad offence group in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables". Table 13 of the issue for 1986 is the latest available and copies of this and earlier bulletins are available in the Library. The Department does not collect information on the medical state of these offenders, and for most motoring offences information is collected on their age only if they are aged under 21. In 1987, over 90 per cent. of those required to take a driving test were aged over 21. Figures for 1987 will be published later this year.

Glen Parva

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to cope with the current problems at the Glen Parva centre for young offenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Apart from the temporary closure of a unit for inmates with special problems, the only specific problem of which we are aware is a shortage of staff, requiring the redeployment of some works officers to discipline duties. We expect this to be resolved as more staff are allocated to the establishment within the next few months.

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects that the special unit for inmates with special problems, opened in April 1986 at the Glen Parva centre for young offenders and recently closed, will be reopened.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The unit opened in April 1986 is planned to reopen as soon as staff can be made available, and within this financial year; another unit with psychiatric support continues to provide a therapeutic environment for disturbed young offenders at Glen Parva.

Unpaid Fines

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, for each of the nine inner London petty sessional divisions, how many cases of unpaid fines still await collection; and at what time point unpaid fines are written off as uncollectable.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not readily available. I will reply as soon as possible.

Detention Centres (Closures)

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement in respect of Her Majesty's detention centre, Gringley on the Hill, Nottingham; and Her Majesty's detention centre, North sea camp, Lincolnshire, as to (a) why these detention centres were closed and (b) what future plans his Department has for them.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Her Majesty's detention centre, Gringley was temporarily closed on 7 March this year. Her Majesty's detention centre, North sea camp ceased to accommodate detention centre trainees on 18 September 1987 but was maintained by a small complement of staff to provide daytime work for parties of prisoners from Her Majesty's prison Morton hall. This action was taken in response to the decline in demand for detention centre accommodation and it enabled staff at both establishments to be deployed in the most effective way to other prison service establishments where they were more urgently needed.

North sea camp has now converted to an open training prison for adult male prisoners and on 4 July this year began to build up a residential population which will increase to 202 as soon as resources allow.

The future of the establishment at Gringley is under review.

Market Harborough Fire Station

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the number of firemen stationed at the Market Harborough fire station will reach establishment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Responsibility for the provision of the fire brigade in the area rests with Leicestershire county council. We understand that, whilst the authority is unable to say when the full establishment at Market Harborough will be reached, efforts are continuing to attract suitable recruits. We are satisfied that, despite the current shortfall, the nationally recommended standards of fire cover are being met.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's practice with regard to progressing any legislative or policy plans where it is advised that they may be challenged under the European convention on human rights.

Mr. Hurd: When consideration is being given to legislative and other proposals full account is taken of the United Kingdom's obligations under the European convention on human rights and of any risk of challenge thereunder.

Official Secrets Act

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will amend the proposals in paragraph 47 of his White Paper on the reform of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act (Cm 408) so that designation, as proposed therein, shall relate to the nature of the material disclosed rather than the position of the individual civil servant.

Mr. John Patten: As the White Paper explains, the Government believe that any unauthorised disclosure by a member of the security and intelligence services is harmful, and should be caught by the criminal law. The same consideration applies to disclosures by certain officials who work closely with those services.

Sanctuary

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take urgent steps to end the practice of the claiming of sanctuary in England and Wales.

Mr. Hurd: Sanctuary was abolished by Parliament in 1623. I think it would be wrong to allow anyone to defy a lawful decision merely by entering a religious building. I reserve the right to secure the removal of anyone who has done so if that is necessary to uphold the rule of law.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were remanded to all prisons in England and Wales for the purposes of psychiatric reports in each year from 1980 to 1987.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 12 July 1988]: The readily available information is given in the table. Information for 1987-88 is not yet available.

Psychiatric reports prepared in prison department establishments in England and Wales on persons remanded in custody for reports.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Further Education

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further measures he proposes to take to ensure that further education responds to the changing employment demands of industry and commerce.

Mr. Jackson: One purpose of the Education Reform Bill is to help further education colleges respond better to the needs of industry and commerce. The Bill will, if enacted, reform the selection and composition of college governing bodies, increasing the proportion of governors representing employment interests. It will also require the delegation to governing bodies of responsibility for the management of colleges, so that they can respond more quickly and effectively. Meanwhile, the Training Commission is continuing to develop its procedures for ensuring that LEA plans for further education take full account of labour market needs. And the National Council for Vocational Qualifications is working to establish a more rational structure of vocational qualifications which will ensure that trainging delivered through the further education system is more relevant to employment needs.

Japanese Language

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress is being made in his discussions on ways of enhancing Japanese language training for exporters.

Mr. Jackson: At present there is nothing I can add to the reply given to my hon. Friend on 16 June at column 186. I will write as soon as there is progress to report.

Under-fives

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, what action he intends to take to ensure that provision for under-fives in primary school is appropriate to their stage of development.

Mr. Dunn: Where such provision is adequately resourced, it can and does fully meet the needs of the four-year-olds concerned. One current problem some LEAs face in this area is a shortage of teachers with relevant experience and my right hon. Friend has recently proposed a new national priority area addressed directly to this in my Department's 1989-90 training grants scheme for in-service teacher training.

Violence in Classrooms

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the response of the various teachers' unions to the setting up of the Elton inquiry on violence in school classrooms.

Mrs. Rumbold: All the unions representing school teachers and head teachers in England and Wales have responded positively to the establishment of the inquiry into discipline in schools, by submitting detailed written evidence for the committee of inquiry's consideration. The National Union of Teachers and the National Association of Head Teachers have mounted special surveys amongst their members, and a number of individual local union branches have also submitted evidence.

Computerised Lathes

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many computerised lathes there are in (a) schools and (b) technical colleges in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not collected centrally.

Religious Education

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many qualified teachers in religious education would be needed to ensure that at least one specialist in this subject is on the staff of every primary and secondary school in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Twenty-three thousand, six hundred and fifty-three in England. There are 4,221 secondary and 19,432 primary schools in England. A special survey of secondary school staffing in 1984 suggests that there were 16,900 full-time and 1,700 part-time secondary teachers who held a post A-level qualification in which religious education was a main or second subject or who had attended an in-service course in RE of at least one term's full-time duration. A similar survey of primary school staffing in 1987 suggests that 16,700 full-time and 2,700 part-time primary school teachers held a post A-level qualification in which religious education was a main or second subject or who had in the previous five years attended an in-service course in RE of at least one term's full-time duration.

The position in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Teachers (Leaving Statistics)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers left the profession in the last full year for which figures are available, in (a) the 50 to 54 years age group, (b) the 55 to 59 years age group and (c) the 60 years and over age group for reasons of (i) retirement, (ii) infirmity and (iii) other; and what percentage of all teachers in each of these age groups these teachers represent.

Mrs. Rumbold: The numbers of full-time school teachers in the given age bands leaving the maintained, assisted and grant-aided sector in the financial year 1985-86, and the percentage they make up of their respective age groups, are as follows:

Age	Number	Percentage of age group
50 to 54	3,490	7·5
55 to 59	5,014	17·0
60 and over	3,592	39·0

Information on how many of these left for reasons of retirement, infirmity and other is not readily available.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mrs. Rumbold: The cost to the Department of employing management or computer consultants for each financial year from 1984-85 to 1987-88 is given in the table.

1984-85	69,300
1985-86	105,847
1986-87	229,842
1987-88	328,677

Similar information for 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mrs. Rumbold: The following contracts to management or computer consultancy firms were extant in the Department as at 1 January 1987:

Name of Firm	Assignment
CCTA	Education Information Study
Deloittes, Haskins and Sells	Financial management advice and assistance to the University Grants Committee.
Deloittes, Haskins and Sells	Review of audit controls over teachers' pensions (payments and contributions.
Loughborough Consultants Ltd	Analysis of universities' responses to the Jarratt report.
Spicer and Peglar Associates	Assessment of Data Envelopment Analysis as a technique for comparing education performance.
Butler Cox	Office Systems Strategy Study

Phlebotomus Fever

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list contracts between the Natural Environment Research Council and the United States Army research institute on infectious diseases in respect of the phlebotomus fever group of viruses.

Mr. Jackson: The Natural Environment Research Council institute of virology has one such contract with the United States Army medical research institute for infectious diseases. The contract is to help diagnose infections in humans and animals, and develop candidate vaccines.

GCSE (Animal Experimentation)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning questions on the subject of animal experimentation set by the southern examining group as part of its general certificate of secondary education examination paper.

Mrs. Rumbold: None. My right hon. Friend and I have received representations concerning stimulus material relating to animal experimentation supplied by the southern examining group for its English syllabus C.

Examinations (Resource Material)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what steps he takes to ensure that the resource material supplied as background to candidates for general certificate of secondary education exams is impartial;

(2) if he will make it his policy to require examining boards to ensure that material supplied to students by them on the subject of animal experimentation includes material from those individuals or organisations involved in such work.

Mrs. Rumbold: The independent GCSE examining groups are responsible for GCSE syllabuses and examination material. The Government look to these bodies to avoid bias in all its aspects, in line with the national criteria for the GCSE. It is for the groups and the Secondary Examinations Council to ensure that the GCSE national criteria are enforced.

ENVIRONMENT

Isle of Dogs Enterprise Zone

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much tax and rates have been forgone in the enterprise zone on the Isle of Dogs.

Mr. Trippier: The tax forgone in the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone cannot be identified. By 31 March 1988, about £16·7 million of rates revenue forgone had been reimbursed to the relevant local authorities.

Canary Wharf

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total public subsidy to Canary wharf to date.

Mr. Trippier: There is no direct subsidy. Improvements costing some £250 million are being made to the public infrastructure to serve developments in that part of docklands which includes Canary wharf.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many jobs he estimates that Canary wharf will provide.

Mr. Trippier: Between 50,000 and 60,000.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much land, previously owned by the London borough of Tower Hamlets, has been acquired by the London Docklands development corporation since its inception.

Mr. Trippier: About 75 acres.

New Towns Commission and Council House Sales (Corby)

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many New Towns Commission and council houses have been sold in the Corby district up to the present date.

Mrs. Roe: I assume that my hon. Friend is interested in sales since 1979. The number of dwellings that each district council has reported selling in the period from 1 April 1979 to 31 December 1987 is given in the table placed in the Library in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 9 June at column 654. During the same period sales were reported of four of the new town dwellings.

Controlled Wastes Inspectorate

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to increase the staff of the controlled wastes inspectorate.

Mr. Moynihan: The controlled wastes inspection branch of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution is at full complement. I have no plans to increase this level of staffing for the fulfilment of current responsibilities.

Football (Crowd Behaviour)

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next expects to have talks with the football authorities about crowd behaviour; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I am in the process of setting up a working party to examine the details of the proposed national membership scheme. The Football League and the Football Association will be represented on the working party which will have its first meeting, under my chairmanship, in the very near future.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, by region and county, the sites designated as of special scientific interest, and the area of each, up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in England.

Mr. Moynihan: The information is not readily available in the form requested and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost. I am arranging, however, to send the hon. Member, and place in the Library, lists of SSSIs in England as at 31 December 1987 showing the site area, whether the site had been notified under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 and those subsequently denotified.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the cost to the Property Services Agency of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Ridley: Expenditure by the Property Services Agency on management or computer consultants for the financial years 1983-84 to 1987-88 was:

	Cost £
1983-84	147,927
1984-85	152,721
1985-86	697,767
1986-87	2,322,106
1987-88	4,623,999

The figures quoted are for financial years as the breakdown by calendar year is not readily available and could be provided only at the expense of considerable staff effort. The figures for 1983-84 are for computer consulting only.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Ridley: Following is the information for DOE(C)

	£ million
1983-84	3·9
1984-85	3·7
1985-86	2·5
1986-87	3·6
1987-88	4·6

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in the Property Services Agency as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Ridley: The following consultancy contracts were extant in the Property Services Agency as at 1 January 1987:

Project	Consultancy Firm

Urban Programme

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the amount of urban programme funding made available to each local authority for the current financial year and the amount this represents per head of population in each area.

Mr. Trippier: Fifty seven authorities have received allocations of urban programme resources for 1988-89, which reflect authorities' overall need as well as their urban programme performance. The amounts are shown in the table, together with the amount per head of population.

Notes:

[1] Population is estimated as at mid-1986.

[2] The table does not include residual payments on the traditional urban programme to certain other local authorities.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list those public agencies answerable to his Department which are jointly or solely responsible for the enforcement of legislation, by title and purpose, concerned with the welfare of farm animals; and if he will give for each of the last three years for which figures are available, the budget staffing of each agency.

Mr. Moynihan: None.

Rates (Payment)

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discretion local authorities have as to whether to collect the 20 per cent. rates from people claiming housing benefit or income support in the form of 10 monthly payments to cover the year's total bill.

Mr. Howard: All ratepayers have the right to pay their rates in 10 monthly instalments. Local authorities may collect rates from their own tenants with rent, which may be on a weekly or fortnightly basis and they may make similar arrangements with other landlords also.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received with respect to tenants living in private accommodation and housing associations, being expected to pay their rates cost in a manner less favourable than those living in local authority accommodation; and if he will make a statement setting out Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of these arrangements, indicating what guidance has been given to housing associations by his Department.

Mr. Howard: I have received no such representations recently and have no proposals to issue guidance on the subject. Domestic rates will cease to be payable on 31 March 1990.

Rating Reform

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in favour of the retention of the rating system.

Mr. Howard: A summary of the 1,217 responses received by 31 October 1986, when the consultation period on the Green Paper ended, was placed in the Library on 15 December 1986. Overall, those respondents who supported the abolition of domestic rates outnumbered those who supported retention by 2 to 1.

Since June 1987, my Department has received some 10,900 letters containing a variety of comments on specific aspects of our proposals, or requesting further information. The letters do not readily lend themselves to an analysis of correspondents' views.

Public Expenditure Survey

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a detailed breakdown for the years 1982-83 to 1990-91, by nature of item and functional area of charge, of the receipts to his programme, DOE—housing and DOE—other environmental services, classified as charges for the purposes of the public expenditure survey.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The table gives figures consistent with those given in the answer the hon. Member received from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 27 May at columns 375-76. The figures relate to income from charges in respect of programme expenditure and exclude capital receipts and receipts in respect of running cost expenditure.

Inner Urban Areas

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will update the table given in answer to the then hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree, in the Official Report, column 324-30, 14 May 1981, using the most recent statistics; and if he will extend the table to include any local authority whose area is covered by an urban development corporation city action team, or inner city task force.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 12 July 1988]: Statistics for the 43 districts then designated under the Inner Urban Areas Act given by the Secretary of State in 1981 were largely based on the 1971 census. Information for all local authorities in England based on the 1981 census are contained in my Department's publication "Census Information Note 2: Urban Deprivation". This was put in the Library of the House on 15 February 1983. This provides information on nine indicators:

(i) unemployed persons;
(ii) overcrowded households;
(iii) single-parent households;
(iv) pensioners living alone;
(v) households lacking exclusive use of basic amenities;
(vi) population change (1971-81);

(vii) standardised mortality rates;
(viii) low-skilled economically active persons; and
(ix) residents living in households where the head of household was born in the New Commonwealth or Pakistan.

More recent statistics are available only for:
(a) population estimates—mid-1986;
(b) population change—1981-86;
(c) standardised mortality ratios; and
(d) unemployment.

This information, for the 57 local authorities in England which benefit from the urban programme, city action teams or the Department of Trade and Industry's inner city task forces, is shown in the table.

Pool Cars

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received regarding criminal offences associated with the use of pool cars; what plans he has for curtailing the abuse of pool cars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

We have found no record of this Department having received any representations on this subject. The investigation of criminal offences is a matter for the police to whom evidence of specific offences should be passed.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretry of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what detailed analysis his Department has made of the effects of comprehensive economic sanctions against South Africa in relation to the living standards of black South Africans.

Mr. Eggar: There is no doubt that, as a wide range of assessments have confirmed, comprehensive economic sanctions would seriously damage the living standards of black South Africans.

Departmental Survey Research Expenditure

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the level of expenditure on survey research for his Department for each year since 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Foreign and Commonwealth Office expenditure in the financial years 1986-87 and 1987-88 on survey research is shown below. No surveys were undertaken prior to 1986-87. The figures include expenditure for both the diplomatic and aid wings.

Year	Expenditure £
1986-87	11,195
1987-88	4,323

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Eggar: Foreign and Commonwealth Office expenditure in the financial years 1986-87 and 1987-88 on management and computer consultancy is shown below. The figures include expenditure for both the diplomatic and aid wings.

Consultancy	1986-87 £	1987-88 £
Management	68,329	257,272
Computer	783,103	1,171,347

Prior to 1986-87 consultancy expenditure was not separately identified in the FCO's accounts. Information for earlier years is therefore not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mullins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Eggar: On 1 January 1987 the following management and computer consultancy contracts were extant in both diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office:

Management consultancies
None
Computer consultancies
Data General	Management accounting and information system
Kinesis Computing Limited	Development of overseas systems
Towngate Software Limited	Development of an overseas accounting system
Computer Sciences Limited	FOLIOS consultancy studies
Logica United Kingdom Limited	FOLIOS consultancy studies
Systems Designers plc	FOLIOS consultancy studies
The Instruction Set	FOLIOS consultancy studies
Psychometric R and D Limited	(i) A financial estimates system (ii) An overseas estates financial system
Price Waterhouse	Computerisation of administration records

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's practice with regard to progressing any legislative or policy plans where it is advised that they may be challenged under the European convention on human rights.

Mr. Eggar: When consideration is being given to legislative and other proposals, full account is taken of our obligations under the European convention on human rights and of any risk of challenge thereunder.

Wormhoudt Massacre

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date his Department handed over to the authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany the British files on the Wormhoudt massacre.

Mr. Eggar: We are in touch with the authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany about the most convenient way to make the information available to them.

DEFENCE

MOD Envelope Form 565

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will change the size of MOD envelope 565 so as to enable it to be fitted into the slots in the Members' Letterboard without being folded.

Mr. Freeman: MOD form 565 is a Post Office approved envelope which is designed to take a standard A4 size sheet of paper, folded twice. It was selected for reasons of economy and standardisation and I have no plans to reduce its size.

Greenham Common

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 6 July, if there is any construction work on existing buildings currently being undertaken at Greenham Common.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As part of the continuing routine maintenance programme at RAF Greenham Common, a hangar and a small storage warehouse are currently being refurbished.

Low Flying

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report figures for low-level flights over southern Scotland, giving an up-to-date table supplying the most recent figures for the table last published in the Official Report 1 May 1987, column 298, in his written answer to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire.

Mr. Freeman: Movements in southern Scotland during 1987 and for the first three months of 1988 are given below in column 2. The number of movements in a flight is variable but around 2·5 on average.

1 Year	2 Movements in southern Scotland	3 Complaints from southern Scotland	4 Complaints from Borders Region
1987	21,453	304	126
1988	2,220*	152	46

* Up to 31 March
Up to 30 June

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing low flying over southern Scotland as a proportion of all low-level flights in the United Kingdom from 1980 to the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Freeman: Numbers of flights have been directly recorded only since 1984. The proportion of low-flying activity experienced in southern Scotland in terms of aircraft movements is given below. The area in question represents approximately 9 per cent. by area of the United Kingdom low-flying system.

Air Search and Rescue

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the rescue missions flown by the 22 SAR flight based at RAF Chivenor to convey injured or sick people to hospitals in north Devon or elsewhere; and if he will identify how many involved service personnel and how many involved civilians.

Mr. Freeman: During 1987, the last complete year for which records are available, search and rescue helicopters from Royal Air Force Chivenor conveyed 29 people to hospitals in north Devon and elsewhere, of whom 28 were civilians.

EMPLOYMENT

Job Training Scheme

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, for each of the Manpower Services Commission's areas in Greater London, Merseyside, Greater Manchester, the Birmingham and Solihull Manpower Services Commission area and for Great Britain as a whole, what are the most recent monthly statistics for new JTS showing (a) entrants in the latest available period, and the number of cumulative entrants since the scheme started, (b) a breakdown of entrants which shows how many were male and female, the length of time they had been out of work, their ethnic backgrounds and whether or not they had any disabilities, (c) the number of trainees in the latest available period who entered work placements and the cumulative total of how many are in work places at the latest available date, and (d) trainees who left the scheme in the latest available period, and the number of cumulative leavers since the scheme started; for all those trainees who have left the scheme how many (i) found work, (ii) failed to attend, (iii) went on to another course of training or education, (iv) completed the course, (v) left for sickness or (vi) went back into unemployment; and what is the total number of currently filled places.

Mr. Cope: At 25 March 1988, the latest date for which figures are available, some 30,435 formerly unemployed people were participating in the new job training scheme (NJTS). The breakdown is set out in the tables. Information on the immediate destinations/reasons for leaving of trainees who have left the scheme are not completed at a Training Commission area office level, as only a minority of trainees inform managing agents of their destinations on leaving NJTS.

More reliable information about job entry rates and other trainee destinations is being gathered by independent follow-up surveys. The first such survey will provide some information on trainees who left NJTS between October 1987 and December 1987, and will be available for Great Britain shortly. Response rates have varied significantly by area; consequently information at that level is unlikely to be available.

The survey will be repeated quarterly and the information base will become fuller, and therefore more reliable at area level, over time.

EETPU (General Secretary)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to meet the general secretary of the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunications and Plumbing Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the general secretary of the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunications and Plumbing Union on a visit to the EETPU's training centre on 19 April.

Low-income Households

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take action to include details of (a) travel-to-work expenses, and (b) work-related childcare costs in the family expenditure survey with a view to their being taken into account in the equivalent scales used in future editions of "Households Below Average Income", and in the assessment of replacement ratios.

Mr. Lee: The quality of the family expenditure survey results depends on there being strict limits on the amount and kind of information that is collected. The detailed information obtained is designed to meet a wide range of different requirements and is agreed between Government Departments. Travel-to-work expenses and work-related child care costs are included in expenditure but are not separately identified. My Department is prepared to consider any changes to the contents of the survey provided there is sufficient support for these and compensating reductions can be made elsewhere.

Equivalence scales as used in "Households Below Average Income" and replacement ratios are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Plant Health Inspectorate

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, in the light of the recent discovery of another outbreak of rhizomania, he proposes to increase the resources directed to the plant health inspectorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: We are taking a number of steps to protect the United Kingdom sugar beet crop from further outbreaks of rhizomania. These include the fumigation of and quarantine conditions imposed on the Suffolk farm where the 1987 outbreak occurred, the very extensive surveying of beet-producing areas since 1983, the monitoring of particular imports where rhizomania could be a risk, however small, the reduction of soil tolerances on imports of potatoes and other vegetables and the disposal of waste fom imported vegetables to approved sites only. Rhizomania was recently discovered in soil from the wrapped root balls of Acers imported from the Netherlands. This single finding of rhizomania did not constitue an outbreak of the disease. The discovery was a result of the vigilance of the plant health inspectorate, and I am satisfied that the resources available to the inspectorate are sufficient to enable it to carry out its task effectively.

Durum Wheat

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why the Council of Ministers agreed to a 12·5 per cent. increase in the aid to producers of durum wheat to coincide with the 5·2 per cent. reduction in the intervention price; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The EC Commission's proposal on durum wheat, to which 11 Member states have provisionally agreed as part of the price-fixing package, is in line with the Commission's continuing policy of gradually reducing the durum wheat intervention price to reach a relationship of 120 per cent. with the common wheat intervention price by 1992-93. Durum wheat is a surplus product. However, durum production is important in certain less-favoured regions, in southern Europe where it is the only option for large numbers of farmers. The increase in the production aid per hectare, which is paid only in these less-favoured regions is intended by the Commission to cushion the impact of the intervention price reduction on these farmers' incomes. We have consistently argued that this aid is not an appropriate measure for dealing with what is largely a social and structual problem.

Toxic Waste

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evidence he has of the hazard to fishing vessels from the burning of toxic waste in ships on the North sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I have no evidence to indicate that the burning of toxic waste in ships on the North sea in accordance with the established rules poses any hazard to fishing vessels. There is only one internationally approved sea incineration site which is located in Dutch waters about 100 miles from the Netherlands coast and about 150 miles from the British coast. This site is out of the way of established shipping lanes and fishing grounds. Furthermore, incineration vessels are subject to controls to prevent incineration taking place within range of other vessels.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list those public agencies answerable to his Department which are jointly or solely responsible for the enforcement of legislation, by title and purpose, concerned with the welfare of farm animals in general, at farms, in transit, at markets and slaughterhouses; and if he will give, for each of the last three years for which figures are available, the budget and staffing of each agency.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The state veterinary service, which is part of my Department, is the main body responsible for animal welfare on the farm. It also co-operates with local authorities, which are principally responsible for enforcement of the legislation on welfare in transit, in markets and in abattoirs. My Department's budget and staffing for animal welfare work, most of which is accounted for by the state veterinary service, is estimated to be as follows:

	Cost £ million	Manpower
1985-86	3·4	127
1986-87	3·1	124
1987-88	3·4	132

New Zealand Butter

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the Commission of the European Economic Community is meeting to discuss New Zealand butter access; and if he has advised the Commission of the views of Her Majesty's Government on the issue.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 11 July. The EC Council of Ministers, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission, is due to take a decision on future access for New Zealand butter before 1 August 1988.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has received any request from representatives of the New Zealand Government to inform the European Economic Community of the views of Her Majesty's Government on New Zealand butter access; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Yes; and I will ensure that those views are communicated to the European Commission at the appropriate time.

Food (Information)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to ensure that Government and industry provide full and open access to all relevant information about food, in particular safety and technical data.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Government regularly publish the reports of their advisory committees on food safety, notably the food advisory committee, the committee on toxicity of chemicals in food, consumer products and the environment, and the steering group on food surveillance.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many ministerial visits were undertaken by his colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office in 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Tom King: The figure is estimated at something in excess of 1,000, as Ministers regularly visit all parts of the Province as part of their duties.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many ministerial visits were undertaken in Northern Ireland by all Ministers in the four years prior to November 1985.

Mr. Tom King: I do not have details of all the visits by Ministers in 1981-85, but I understand that they maintained the same practice of frequent visits to all parts of the Province.

Belvoir Park Hospital

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact of the decline of the number of physicists and technicians in the radiotherapy unit in Belvoir park hospital, Powdersburn on the treatment of patients and servicing the unit.

Mr. Needham: I am not aware of any decline in the number of physicists and technicians at the radiotherapy unit in Belvoir park hospital.

Belvoir Estates, Castlereagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the water trench was excavated across the roadway in Belvoir Estates, Castlereagh, opposite 11 Castledillon road; and what proposals there are to reinstate the roadway surface over this trench.

Mr. Needham: Excavations to lay a water main in Castledillon road were made on 4 June 1986, and the trench reinstated the same day. As the road surface is satisfactory, the Department has no plans to carry out further reinstatement works.

Winnie Thompson

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long has Winnie Thompson of Victoria gardens, Ballyhalbert, County Down, been on the waiting list at Musgrave hospital, Belfast for a hip replacement operation; and when this operation is expected to take place.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Eastern health and social services board. However, I understand Mrs. Thompson's GP wrote to Musgrave park hospital on 23 April 1988 to make an appointment for her to be examined and assessed by an orthopaedic consultant. Because of the heavy demands on the orthopaedic service, the Eastern board has not yet been able to arrange such an appointment. It is therefore not possible at this stage to say whether a hip replacement operation would be appropriate in Mrs. Thompson's case and if so when it is likely to take place.

Fair Employment

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the practising definition of affirmative action which his Department will use in relation to fair employment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: The White Paper on Fair Employment (paragraph 3.20) defines affirmative action as "special measures taken to promote a more representative distribution of employment in the workforce and designed to give all sections of the community full and equal access to employment opportunities".

Affirmative action programmes thus provide the framework within which appointment on merit can properly operate, by removing any unnecessary obstacles which are preventing a wider range of applicants from coming forward, and by broadening the field from which employees are drawn.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provisions of additional staff have been made for the Fair Employment Commission to carry out its increased work load and responsibility.

Mr. Viggers: The staffing of the Fair Employment Agency has already been doubled over the past three years. This provision will be kept under review to ensure that the resources provided for the new Fair Employment Commission are fully commensurate with its functions and responsibilities.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost to an average employer of implementing the Government's required monitoring system.

Mr. Viggers: It is difficult to define an average employer. All public sector and most private sector employers will be required to monitor. The cost in any particular case will depend on the size of the work force and the nature of the employer's personnel information system.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which meetings of the Fair Employment Tribunal will be open to the public and press; and what criteria will be used to decide whether to hold the proceedings in camera.

Mr. Viggers: Para 2.23 of the White Paper indicated that the procedures and general approach of the Fair Employment Tribunal will be similar to those which apply in sex discrimination cases before the industrial tribunals. Like the industrial tribunals, the Fair Employment Tribunal will have a discretion to hear cases in private if the tribunal considers this appropriate in the circumstances of the case.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what provisions will be made for the individual claimant unable to afford the cost of prosecuting a case to the new Fair Employment Tribunal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: The White Paper indicated (paragraphs 2.13-2.14 and 2.23) that the Fair Employment Commission will have a discretion to assist individual complainants before the new tribunal where a question of principle arises; where it would be unreasonable to expect the individual to pursue the case; and where any other special considerations apply. Whether a case is taken directly or assisted by the commission, the commission will also be able to give general advice to any individual about the anti-discrimination law and about how a case can be pursued.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evaluation process will be used to determine the success of the Fair Employment Commission after it has been established; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: The White Paper indicated that the effectiveness of the new legislation will be continuously evaluated and formally reviewed after five years. That process will include an evaluation of the commission's experiences in conducting pattern and practice cases, as well as other information on improvements in employment and recruitment practices. The impact of the new legislation and the commission established under it will best be measured by assessing the changes that take place in the future experiences of under-represented groups in gaining access to employment.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what time scale he will be expecting compliance from employers on matters of registration and monitoring in relation to fair employment policies.

Mr. Viggers: The Government's intention is that there should be prompt compliance with the new legislation, and there will be statutory time limits both for registration and for the submission of monitoring returns. The detailed provision will be addressed when the Bill is before the House.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he will take to ensure the protection of other religious minorities besides Catholics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: The present legislation already affords protection against discrimination to persons of all religious beliefs. The intention is that the substantially strengthened provisions of the proposed new legislation should continue to afford protection to persons of all religious beliefs.

Royal Ulster Constabulary Disciplinary Hearing

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will announce the choice of chief constable to conduct the Royal Ulster Constabulary disciplinary hearing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: The choice of a chief constable to conduct any disciplinary hearing in respect of the Royal Ulster Constabulary is a matter for the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. I understand that he intends to announce a chief constable to hear the disciplinary charges arising out of the report by Mr. Charles Kelly as soon as possible.

Social Fund

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number and total value of social fund payments in each social security office in Northern Ireland from April 1987 to April 1988.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The available information is as follows:

Because of industrial action in June 1987 the figures are incomplete. Five offices having failed to provide information.

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what were the claims to the social fund and loans and grants paid by the social fund in each social security office since 11 April; and what was the budget for that period;

(2) what is the number and value of community care grants made by each social security office since 11 April.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 8 July 1988]: Details of the claims to the social fund were given in my reply of 8 July 1988. Information about the numbers and amounts of awards and the budgets for the period 11 April 1986 to 31 May 1988 (the latest date for which information is available) is given in the table.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by office for each complete month since the introduction of the social fund the actual expenditure and the expenditure as a percentage of the monthly budget on budgeting loans, crisis loans and community care grants.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: Social security offices do not have monthly budgets but managers do draw up monthly profiles of anticipated expenditure. On the basis of these profiles, the information for the periods 11 to 30 April 1988 and 1 to 31 May 1988 (the latest date for which information is available) is given in the table.

Housing Benefit

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's central computerised system of payment will be used to operate the system of transitional protection for housing benefit claimants;

(2) if during the period of transitional protection for housing benefit claimants he intends to operate an opting-in system.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 30 June 1988]: The housing benefit transitional payment scheme will be administered by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive for tenants and by the Department of the Environment rating division for owner-occupiers. As far as possible both organisations will identify housing benefit losers likely to qualify for transitional payments and will issue invitations to them to apply.

A leaflet will also be made available, including an application form, for any housing benefit loser who has not been contacted by the end of August and thinks he or she may qualify.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the numbers of gainers and losers in Northern Ireland as a result of the housing benefit changes as a whole, and the numbers of people who have gained (a) more than £5, (b) between £4 and £5, (c) between £3 and £4, (d) between £2 and £3, (e) between £1 and £2, and (f) less than £1, and the numbers who have lost (i) less than £1, (ii) between £1 and £2, (iii) between £2 and £3, (iv) between £3 and £4, (v) between £4 and £5, (vi) between £5 and £10, (vii) £10 and £15 and (viii) more than £15.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: The only information readily available is as follows:

Ranges	Gainers	Losers
Under £1 pw	39,672	11,320
£1 to £1·99	30,476	6,977
£2 to £2·99	3,250	3,351
£3 to £3·99	2,498	1,880
£4 to £4·99	2,279	1,236
£5 and over	6,057	6,633
Totals	84,232	31,397

Note:
The figures relate to tenants who renewed their claims to housing benefit in April 1988 and take no account of awards expected to be made by way of transitional protection.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements will be made in Northern Ireland to limit the losses caused by the changes in housing benefit implemented in April.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: A housing benefit transitional payments scheme, similar to the scheme announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 27 April 1988, will operate in Northern Ireland.

The scheme will be administered by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland.

Income Support

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total amount of weekly payments of income support paid by each social security office in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 8 July 1988]: I regret that the information is not readily available.

Mr. Hume: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of people in receipt of income support in each social security office in a given week.

Mr. Needham: [holding answer 8 July 1988]: The information is as follows:

Number of people receiving Income Support on 31 May 1988

Benefits

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the latest figures available for the take-up in Northern Ireland of (a) supplementary benefit, (b) family income supplement and (c) housing benefit, in the private and public sectors.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: The available information is 65 per cent.[1] for family income supplement and 88 per cent.[2] for housing benefit in the public sector.

[1]The figure relates to employees only, the sources being data from the Family Resources and Household Finances Surveys (1979-80).

[2]The figure relates to tenants, the source being a survey undertaken on behalf of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in 1984.

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide the latest estimates for unclaimed benefit as a whole in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: I regret that no such information is available.

Family Credit

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide figures of the number of people in Northern Ireland who have lost entitlement to free school meals and free milk and vitamins as a result of the change from family income supplement to family credit.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: Precise figures are not available but just under 15,000 families who were in receipt of family income supplement immediately prior to its replacement in April by family credit would have lost entitlement to either free school meals or free welfare foods (or both). Cash help of £2·55 a week for each child was included by way of compensation for this loss in the succeeding family credit award.

Widow's Pension

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland are likely to lose money as a result of the raising of the age of entitlement to widow's pension from 40 to 45 years on 11 April; and how many will lose as a result of the increase in the age for reduction of widow's pension introduced in April.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: It is estimated that 40 people a year in Northern Ireland will not be entitled to widow's pension as a result of the raising of the age of entitlement from 40 to 45 from 11 April 1988. It is also estimated that 180 people a year will have a reduced rate of widow's pension as a result of the raising of the age of entitlement to the full rate from 45 to 50 from that date. All such people will be entitled to the new lump sum widow's payment of £1,000.

Sewage Pumping Station (Donaghadee)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals there are to construct a sewage pumping station at Quarry green, near Copelands marina, Donaghadee; when he expects to receive an application for planning approval for this proposal; in what way the public of Donaghadee will be consulted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 11 July 1988]: A proposal to construct a pumping station at Quarry green, Donaghadee, as part of a sewerage improvement scheme, has been discussed with Ards borough council on two occasions and with individual councillors and county officials. Further meetings with councillors and representatives of the local residents' association are planned. An application for outline planning permission was made on 27 June, and this will be advertised in the local press and notified to the immediate neighbours in the normal way.

Salmon Fishing (Foyle)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show (a) the commercial catch and (b) the rod catch of salmon in the Foyle system for each of the last 15 years, indicating for each year what percentage of the total catch was taken by rod fishermen, and the sums collected from (i) rod licences and (ii) commercial fishermens' licences.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 12 July 1988]: The information requested for commercial and rod catches, the percentage of rod catches and the revenue from rod and commercial licences for the years 1973-87 is provided in the table. It must be borne in mind that very few rod anglers make returns, whereas all commercial fishermen are required to make returns.

ENERGY

Electricity Producers Insurance Company

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he had with the chairmen of the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board prior to the establishment of the Electricity Producers Insurance company Ltd.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Central Electricity Generating Board informed my Department of its intention to set up the company jointly with the South of Scotland Electricity Board. The decision to set up the company was a commercial matter for the boards.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proposals he has for the Electricity Producers Insurance company in the light of the proposed privatisation of the electricity industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: That is a matter on which we are consulting the industry.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to which electricity boards own shares in the Electricity Producers Insurance company

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Central Electricity Generating Board's report and accounts for 1986-87 state on page 11 that the Electricity Producers Insurance company is jointly owned by the board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what information he has as to why the Electricity Producers Insurance company is incorporated in the Isle of Man;

(2) what information he has as to who are the directors of the Electricity Producers Insurance company.

Mr. Michael Spicer: These are commercial matters for the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board. I have asked the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to write to the hon. Member.

Non-fossil Fuels

Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, when setting the non-fossil fuel obligation for the electricity industry, he will include electricity generated from methane produced from sewage, biomass, municipal waste and other sources not derived from natural gas.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The details of the non-fossil fuel obligation are still under discussion. However, my current intention is that methane produced from sources other than natural strata should be classified as a non-fossil fuel.

Piper Alpha Disaster Fund

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what arrangements he intends to make with respect to payments of the Government's contribution to the Piper Alpha disaster fund.

Mr. Parkinson: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 8 July, the Government intend to contribute £1 million to the Piper Alpha disaster fund. Parliamentary approval for this expenditure will be sought in a Supplementary Supply Estimate for the Department of Energy's class VI, vote 2. Pending that approval, urgent payment of the full contribution will be made by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Law and Order (Inner Cities)

3. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning inner-city policy in relation to law and order issues; and if he will make a statement.

24. Mr. Thorne: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning law and order and inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

72. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning inner-city policy and law and order issues; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have had a number of discussions with those involved in inner-city regeneration and the action for cities campaign. The Government are agreed on the importance of a safe secure environment in attracting investment and raising the confidence of inner-city residents. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has launched a number of key initiatives on crime prevention measures and has already established the first three safer cities projects in urban areas to reduce crime, lessen the fear of crime and encourage enterprise and a sense of community.

Transport (Inner Cities)

8. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning transport in relation to inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: Inner city transport is, of course, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, but transport issues are raised from time to time in discussions I have with inner-city business men.

Inward Development

16. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if his Department has any plans to provide assistance to inward development schemes.

Mr. Atkins: Regional selective assistance is available to attract inward investment projects which meet the scheme's criteria.

Enterprise Initiative

17. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the response to the enterprise initiative.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The enterprise initiative continues to be a tremendous success. We remain on course to achieve our White Paper target of 1,000 supported consultancies per month in 1988-89.

Departmental Logo

19. Sir John Biggs-Davison: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received seeking the withdrawal of the logo currently used by his Department and the restoration of an insignia which clearly indicates that he and his Department are in the service of the Crown, including reference to the position of the Secretary of State as President of the Board of Trade; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have received no such representations.

Distribution Industry (Investment)

20. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has regarding the investment intentions in 1988 of the distribution industry; and what are the comparable figures for 1987.

Mr. Atkins: The Department of Trade and Industry carries out a regular survey of industry's investment intentions. While the survey does not include estimates for the distribution industries alone, the latest survey indicates a level of investment in 1988 by the construction, distribution and selected service industries of £16·3 billion in 1980 prices. This represents an increase of 10 per cent. on the record 1987 level of £14·8 billion.

Barlow Clowes

21. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received about his Department's role in relation to Barlow Clowes fund management companies since his statement of 13 June, Official Report, columns 24-32.

Mr. Maude: Over the last month my Department has received a very large number of representations from hon. Members and from the public, many of which refer to my Department's role in relation to Barlow Clowes.

77. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to be able to publish the findings of Sir Godfray Le Quesne's inquiry into his Department's handling of Barlow Clowes' licences.

Mr. Maude: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) of 29 June 1988, at columns 237-38. Subject to no legal impediment as to content or timing, I propose to publish Sir Godfray Le Quesne's report as soon as practicable after it is completed.

Inner Cities

22. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what evidence from abroad he has considered in deciding on his policy towards inner cities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I see a good deal of material about inner-city policy abroad, including information about various initiatives and projects in the United States, some of which I visited last January.

Exporters (Performance)

23. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the performance of Britain's exporters over the last year.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months ended May total export volume increased by 2½ per cent.

Steel Quotas

25. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received on the removal of steel quotas within the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Over the last 12 months I have received a number of representations on behalf of consumers pressing for the early removal of the European steel production quota system. I attended the Industry Council's meeting on 24 June when we decided that quotas should expire at the end of last month.

91. Mr. Wood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made of the effects of the ending of European steel quotas on steel consumers and users.

Mr. Atkins: The ending of the European steel production quota system will be of significant benefit to steel users. It is expected that quota liberalisation will increase consumer choice, and reduce costs since producers will no longer be liable to fines for exceeding production limits.

European Regional Development Fund

26. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the total United Kingdom level of receipts from the European regional development fund, in the latest year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: United Kingdom receipts from the European regional development fund totalled £391 million in 1987. I look forward to the fund continuing to make its important contribution to British regional development.

Trade Gap

27. Mrs. Wise: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on measures being proposed to reduce Britain's visible trade gap.

Mr. Alan Clark: The trade balance can be affected by a variety of market factors, but the Government will stick to the firm monetary and fiscal policies essential to strong economic performance. Wherever practicable my Department is ready to give assistance to firms seeking to improve their competitive strength and trade performance, as, for example, through the recently introduced enterprise initiative.

52. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's visible trade gap.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the five months ended May 1988 there was a deficit on visible trade of £7 billion.

Japan

28. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what recent steps he has taken to ensure that trade with Japan is on a fully reciprocal basis.

Mr. Alan Clark: As a result of pressure from the United Kingdom and our trading partners, Japan has stimulated domestic demand-led growth, and imports have increased rapidly. United Kingdom exports to Japan are up by almost 30 per cent. over the last 12 months. We and the European Community are continuing to press the Japanese authorities to remove the remaining problems of market access.

Action for Cities (Campaign)

29. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the response of the private sector to the six action for cities breakfast presentations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Over 1,200 senior business men attended the six working breakfasts and about a quarter have already made specific offers of help. The offers included secondments, managed workshop space, industry/education links and free advice to inner city businesses. These offers are being pursued by the city action teams and I am receiving reports on the progress made in taking them up.

Imports

30. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the change in the volume of imports in the last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Total import volume in the year ended May was 9 per cent. above that in the previous year.

Eureka Programme

31. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the average time taken from originating application to final go-ahead to approve applications for funding under the Eureka programme.

Mr. Butcher: It has taken, on average, six months, from date of receipt to date of formal offer for my Department to process applications for funding Eureka projects.

78. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many United Kingdom firms and research institutes are associated with Eureka projects; how many projects now have full United Kingdom participation; and what is the total value of these projects.

Mr. Butcher: About 140 firms and research organisations from the United Kingdom are currently associated with Eureka projects: 74 Eureka projects—with a total value of £1·2 billion—now have full United Kingdom participation.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many projects are currently being researched in the United Kingdom under the auspices of the Eureka programme; if he will list those projects in the Official Report; and if he will make a statement relating to their progress.

Mr. Butcher [holding answer 12 July 1988]: As detailed, firms and research organisations from the United Kingdom are currently participating in 74 agreed projects and 13 EUREKA proposals. In addition, there are formal expressions of interest from United Kingdom industry in a further 22 EUREKA projects. I am placing in the Library of the House a synopsis of all EUREKA projects and proposals.

The indications are that projects are progressing satisfactorily. However, EUREKA is a comparatively new initiative with projects tending to come to fruition some three to four years after they start. Therefore, the majority of these projects are just beginning to get under way, are in their definition phases, or are in the very early stages of their implementation phases.

York Borg Warner, Basildon

32. Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received from York Borg Warner of Basildon about the implications for British industry of the proposed European Economic Community regulations on the standardisation of components for the air-conditioning and cooling system industry.

Mr. Maude: A letter has been received from the director of manufacturing at York International about the difficulties it has experienced when trying to export to certain EEC countries because of various national inspection codes. My Office has written to the company and the official responsible for such matters will also follow up his earlier contact.

It is because of such difficulties that my Department places so much importance on the efforts now being made towards the completion of the single market by 1992 and proposed measures aimed at both pressure vessels and machinery safety should help to make it easier for manufacturers of air-conditioning equipment to sell their products into the European Community.

Manufacturing Output

33. Mr. Knox: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the most recent figure for output in manufacturing industry; and what was the figure for the same month in 1973.

Mr. Atkins: In April 1988 manufacturing output was at a level of 114·8, based on 1980 equal to 100. This is 2 per cent. more than the level of 112·6 for April 1973. But my hon. Friend will appreciate that monthly data can be erratic. A firmer basis for comparison would be that in the three months to April 1988 manufacturing output was broadly unchanged from the same period in 1973 though over 21 per cent. higher than in the trough of the recession in 1981.

Single Market

34. Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will make a statement on the completion of the single market in the light of the outcome of the Hanover summit.

Mr. Maude: The Hanover European Council agreed that the objective of completing the single market is now irreversible. Almost 200 separate measures have already been agreed, including over 50 in the first half of this year alone. Notable agreements reached over the last month on the liberalisation of capital movements, the mutual recognition of professional qualifications and the opening up of the international road haulage market are a clear demonstration that barriers to trade in the Community are being cut, to the benefit of both business and the consumer. The Council also set out four priority areas for further work: opening up of public purchasing; further liberalisation of banking and other financial services; common standards for manufactured products; and intellectual property. We strongly endorse these priorities, and will be working to ensure that the momentum is maintained towards completion of the single market.

Northern Region

35. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many companies in the northern region have taken advantage of his Department's new initiatives.

Mr. Atkins: In the period from 13 January 1988, when the DTI's enterprise initiative was launched, to 30 June 1988, the DTI received from firms in the northern region 467 applications for the consultancy initiatives and 64 applications for regional enterprise grants. In addition, there have been 85 applications from firms in the region for DTI's competition for innovation, the small firms merit award for research and technology.

36. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he will next be visiting the Northern Council of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss investment and industry in the northern region.

43. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he will next be visiting the Northern Council of the Confederation of British Industry.

90. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he will next be visiting the Northern Council of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss regional policy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no present plans to visit the Northern Council of the CBI although I do meet regularly northern businesses both here and during my frequent visits to the region. In my two recent visits to Teesside and to Newcastle I was encouraged to hear business people themselves confirming the reports of industrial progress and prospects for further growth which have figured in successive CBI surveys.

39. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received concerning the shortage of factory space in the northern region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My colleagues and I have received a number of representations from hon. Members and others about the rising demand for factory space in the northern region, which is one consequence of the general improvement in economic conditions in the area.

71. Mr. Leadbitter: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has concerning the average level of rents for factory units above 7,000 sq ft in the northern region.

Mr. Atkins: Rents for work space in the northern region vary widely according to their type, size, age and location. I understand that the rents currently charged or being sought by English Estates for units about 701 sq metres (7,546 sq ft) in the region between about 40p and 650p per sq ft.

94. Mr. Radice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received on behalf of constituents of the hon. Member for Durham, North concerning the shortage of factory space in the northern region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My colleagues and I have received a number of representations from hon. Members and others about the rising demand for factory space in the northern region which is one consequence of the general improvement in economic conditions in the area. These include the paper submitted by the hon. Member himself.

Financial Services Act

37. Mr. Doran: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he is taking to assess the workings of the Financial Services Act; and if he will make a statement.

57. Mr. Morley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he is taking to measure the success of the working of the Financial Services Act.

Mr. Maude: The Secretary of State and the chairman of the SIB have agreed to take stock on a regular basis to assess the development of the new regulatory regime and its impact on investment businesses.

95. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what recent representations he has received regarding the operation of the Financial Services Act.

Mr. Maude: I continue to receive comments on the operation of the Act, many of which are for the SIB to deal with.

Securities and Investments Board

38. Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what recent discussions he has had with the newly appointed chairman of the Securities and Investments Board.

Mr. Maude: I last met the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board on Monday 4 July.

RB 235.524 L Engine

40. Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has received an application for launch aid from Rolls-Royce for the RB 235.524 L engine.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. I am considering the application.

OFTEL

41. Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will urgently introduce legislation to strengthen the powers of Oftel in relation to the protection of domestic and commercial telephone consumers against overcharging and service deficiencies.

Mr. Butcher: No. Consumers are already benefiting from Oftel's activities in these areas. The Director General of Telecommunications has wide-ranging powers which he exercises very effectively and he has not asked for these to be augmented.

Girobank (Sale)

42. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consultations he has had with representatives of sub-postmasters and mistresses about the forthcoming sale of Girobank.

Mr. Butcher: The Post Office is selling Girobank, and consultations with its agents and employees are a matter for the Post Office.

70. Mr. Harris: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made on the privatisation of Girobank.

Mr. Butcher: The Post Office has informed me that 100 bodies have registered an interest in buying Girobank.

Balance of Trade

44. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative balance of trade for the last 12 months; and what measures are being taken to improve it.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months ended May, the current account was in deficit by £7·1 billion. The trade balance can be affected by a variety of market factors, but the Government will stick to the firm monetary and fiscal policies essential to strong economic performance. Wherever practicable my Department is ready to give assistance to firms seeking to improve their competitive strength and trade performance, as, for example, through the recently introduced enterprise initiative.

Regional Policy

45. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on recent developments in the Government's regional policy.

47. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on recent developments in the Government's regional policy.

Mr. Atkins: The recent DTI White Paper announced significant changes to regional policy designed to make it more effective. My Department's enterprise initiative aims to encourage enterprise and growth throughout the country, but recognises that special help is needed in some areas. Regional selective assistance continues to be available to firms in the assisted areas; regional enterprise grants to support investment and innovation projects are available for firms in the development areas with fewer than 25 employees; and in all assisted and urban programme areas the DTI will pay a higher level (two thirds) of the cost of consultancy projects designed to improve key management functions.

Motor Industry (Estimating Work)

46. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will refer to the Director General of Fair Trading the practice by certain motor agents and dealers of charging consumers for giving an estimate.

Mr. Butcher: No. I am not aware of this practice being widespread or giving rise to consumer complaints. The Director General of Fair Trading has a duty under the Fair Trading Act 1973 to keep under review trading practices which may adversely affect the economic interests of consumers, and I am sure that he would look into this practice if he considered it appropriate to do so.

Trade Deficit

48. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his latest estimate of the trade deficit for the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months ended May, the current account of the balance of payments was in deficit by £7·1 billion.

66. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster with which European Economic Community countries Britain is currently running a trade deficit.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months to May 1988 United Kingdom visible trade was in deficit with the following EC member states:

Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, France, Denmark, Belgium-Luxembourg and Portugal.

83. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative trade deficit over the past 12 months; and what steps are being taken to improve it.

87. Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative trade deficit over the past 12 months; and what steps are being taken to reduce it.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months ended May, the current account was in deficit by £7·1 billion. The trade balance can be affected by a variety of market factors, but the Government will stick to the firm monetary and fiscal policies essential to strong economic performance. Wherever practicable my Department is ready to give assistance to firms seeking to improve their competitive strength and trade performance, as, for example, through the recently introduced enterprise initiative.

100. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative trade deficit so far in the current year.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the five months ended May, the current account of the balance of payments was in deficit by £4·7 billion.

Post Office Counters

49. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the future of Post Office Counter Services.

Mr. Butcher: The Post Office's proposals for the future of its counters subsidiary will be considered in the context of the revised counters business plan which will be submitted to me later this year.

99. Mr. Stott: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what response he will make to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on Post Office Counters.

Mr. Butcher: The Post Office is currently considering the MMC's many recommendations. A statement setting out an initial response to the MMC's findings will be made within three to four months of the report's publication, in the light of the Post Office's reactions.

Next Step Strategy

50. Mr. Watts: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to implement the next steps strategy within his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. and noble Friend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and I intend to apply the recommendations in the report "Improving Management in Government: The Next Steps" as rapidly and extensively as possible. We announced in February that the Companies Registration Office was a candidate for transformation into an agency. We hope that the agency will be operational later this year. The Department contains a number of other units which are principally involved in the delivery of services and are potential candidates for transformation into executive agencies. They include the DTI research establishments other than the national engineering laboratory, the insolvency service, and business statistics office, the patent office, export services, radiocommunications division, and DTI regional offices. We will be considering over the next year or two whether these units will benefit from conversion into agencies.

United States Export Administration Act

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what further measures he proposes to take to minimise the adverse repercussions for United Kingdom trade of the United States of America's Export Administration Act.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have rejected on many occasions United States claims to extraterritorial jurisdiction—including those in the United States Export Administration Act—which infringe on United Kingdom sovereignty. Any British firm experiencing difficulties in the course of legitimate trading in or from the United Kingdom should contact the Department of Trade and Industry. Measures to help resolve specific problems will be considered on a case-by-case basis as they arise. Under the Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980, the Secretary of State has discretionary powers to prevent United Kingdom companies complying with foreign claims to jurisdiction in the United Kingdom.

Manufacturing Industry (Investment)

54. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has regarding the investment intentions in the current year of manufacturing industry; and what was the comparable figure in 1987.

Mr. Maude: The latest investment intentions survey carried out by my Department indicates that in 1988 investment in manufacturing industry, including leased assets, will amount to about £8·7 billion at 1980 prices. Investment in 1987 was £7·4 billion at 1980 prices.

58. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the current level of manufacturing investment; and what was the level in 1979.

Mr. Atkins: The latest year for which investment statistics are available is 1987 when investment in manufacturing industry, including leased assets, was £7·4 billion at 1980 prices. The corresponding investment in 1979 and 1983 was £8·2 billion and £5·6 billion, respectively, at 1980 prices.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will take steps to increase investment in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Atkins: Investment decisions are for firms themselves to make. But the excellent prospects for growth in manufacturing investment reflect the success of policies designed to provide a climate in which industry can perform effectively, which we shall continue to pursue. This success is demonstrated by the strong growth in manufacturing investment since early last year, as well as by the results of my Department's latest survey of investment intentions.

Inner Cities (Employment)

55. Mr. Favell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning employment and inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

84. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning employment and training and inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Employment and training initiatives form an important part of the work undertaken by the inner city task forces and city action teams. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is introducing measures to appoint specialist Training Commission and employment service staff in inner city areas, extend and improve basic skills training and encourage more employers to become training providers. My right hon. Friend is also introducing the new employment training programme for adults which will provide substantial new help to enable inner city residents to obtain the skills they need to take up job opportunities.

Corporate Headquarters

56. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the number of corporate headquarters whose ownership has been transferred from the regions and nations to London and the south-east since 1979.

Mr. Aitkins: I regret that this information is not available.

OECD Countries (Deficit)

59. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development countries are running a greater trade deficit than the United Kingdom per head of population.

Mr. Alan Clark: The most recent data for OECD countries generally relate to 1987. In that year the following countries had larger estimated current account deficits per capita:

Norway, the United States, Denmark, Australia, Finland, New Zealand, Iceland, Canada, Greece, Sweden and France.

Open for Business Campaign

60. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what results his Department's Europe open for business campaign has achieved to date.

Mr. Maude: Since our campaign was launched in March, there has been a major increase in awareness of the single market.

Over 100,000 inquiries for further information have been received, most via our 1992 telephone hotline, and business awareness of the 1992 target date is now about 80 per cent.

The next step is to ensure that firms take action to seize the single market opportunities.

Airbus Project

61. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a further statement on the progress being made at Airbus Industrie in relation to the Airbus project.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At the last meeting of the aerospace Ministers of the Airbus partner countries which I attended, the partners in Airbus Industrie were asked to report progress on implementing the recommendations of the Airbus "wise men's" report when the Ministers next meet, in early September. I look forward to hearing that report which I hope will confirm that the partners are on course to the introduction of the new arrangements for management of the project by the agreed deadline of the end of this year.

Inner Cities (Environmental and Local Government Policy)

62. Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning environmental and local government matters and inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

65. Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning environmental and local government issues and inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Environmental and local government matters are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment but are frequently raised in discussions I have with local business men and others involved in inner-city regeneration and the action for cities campaign. In these discussions we agree about the importance of improving the environment of inner cities in order to attract investment and encourage development. The Government support this through, for example, the urban programme, derelict land grant and the new city grant, which are aimed at attracting private investment. Business men also raise with me the need for local authorities to help create the right climate for enterprise by removing unnecessary obstacles to growth and reducing the rate burden on business. The Government are supporting this objective through, for example, the proposal for a national non-domestic rate which will directly benefit many inner-city businesses.

British Shipbuilders

63. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met the chairman of British Shipbuilders; what matters were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I last met Mr. Lister on Thursday 7 July. We discussed the present position of British Shipbuilding and its various businesses in some detail.

Commercial Vehicle Production

64. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the level of commercial vehicle production in May 1988; and what are the comparable figures on output and export figures for (a) the six months to May 1988 and (b) the previous six month period.

Mr. Atkins: Provisional figures show that in May 27,384 commercial vehicles were produced in the United Kingdom, 8,462 of which were for export.

For the six months to May, 139,422 commercial vehicles were produced, 38,080 for export; comparable figures for the previous six months are 125,911 and 29,619 respectively.

Mercury Telecommunications Systems

67. Mr. Michael Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what evaluation of Mercury Telecommunications Systems has been undertaken with respect to the possible use by his Department; what were the results; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: In conjunction with the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA), an evaluation of the use of Mercury Telecommunications Systems exchange lines was carried out by my Department based on telephone traffic for our headquarters building at 1-19 Victoria street. This established that worthwhile savings could be made. Mercury telephone lines were therefore installed at 1-19 Victoria street in February 1988. The first account received has confirmed that savings are being made and the Department is therefore now liaising with CCTA for the early introduction of Mercury to other DTI buildings in the Whitehall area. Discussions are also currently taking place with Mercury for possible connection of other DTI buildings outside the Whitehall area.

Overseas Earnings

68. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what forecast he has for the overseas earnings of (a) the courier and express service industry, (b) the ship broking industry, (c) the education services industry and (d) the investment management industry.

Mr. Maude: There are no official forecasts of the overseas earnings of these sectors. However, the British Invisible Exports Council surveys the prospects of the overseas earnings of a number of service sectors and publishes its findings.

Industrial Competitiveness

69. Mr. Michael: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has recently received from the Confederation of British Industries on the competitiveness of British industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Most of the contacts that my Department has with the Confederation of British Industry involve matters with a bearing on United Kingdom competitiveness in one way or another.

British Firms (American Acquisitions)

73. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has as to acquisitions of American companies by British firms.

Mr. Maude: The available information relates to the value of the acquisitions of share and loan capital of United States companies by United Kingdom companies. Only those funded from the United Kingdom are included. The acquisition of holdings of 20 per cent. and above of United States companies' share capital and increases in existing holdings are shown indistinguishably. Information about takeovers of United States companies (the acquiring of more than 50 per cent. of United States companies' share capital) could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The following is the information:

	£ million
1981	1,633[1]
1982	946[1]
1983	1,082[1]
1984	1,565
1985	1,754
1986	4,481

[1] Excludes acquisitions by oil companies.

Telecommunications Hardware

74. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the balance of trade in telecommunications hardware between the United Kingdom and the rest of the European Economic Community; and what was the figure in 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The crude balance of trade with the United Kingdom's 11 EC partners in telecommunications hardware, as defined by the principal products of the standard industrial classification activity heading 3441, for 1987 showed a deficit of £60·2 million. In 1984 the crude balance of trade was £20·8 million in deficit.

Inner-City Policy

75. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held with representatives of the Confederation of British Industry concerning the co-ordination of inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

82. Mr. Bevan: To ask the Chancellor to the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held with representatives of the Confederation of British Industry concerning the co-ordination of inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I met representatives of the CBI on 6 May to discuss proposals for a special CBI initiative to encourage inner-city regeneration and business leadership. I very much welcome this initiative, which was launched in Newcastle on 14 June.

Polypropolene Filament Yarn

76. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he is taking to halt the allegedly illegal subsidy by the French Government to Filature du Hainaut in the light of the implications for competition for British manufacturers of polypropolene filament yarn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are considering the position. The EC Commission has been investigating whether the proposed aid is consistent with the objectives of the EC synthetic fibres discipline in relation to state aid and it has yet to announce its conclusions.

Trade Figures

79. Mr. Madel: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether his Department is planning to make any changes in the way United Kingdom trade figures are presented after the completion of the European single market in 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The presentation of United Kingdom trade statistics after the completion of the European single market in 1992 has yet to be decided. Member states are currently involved in discussions with the European Communities' statistical office about possible alternative methods of collecting the figures if Customs' documentation—the current source of the figures—should disappear with the removal of customs boundaries.

It is hoped that a draft proposal for a method of collecting trade statistics after 1992, to be applicable in all member states, will be available later this year.

Commercial Developments

80. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations from chambers of commerce about proposed commercial developments he has received in the past two months.

Mr. Atkins: I have received no such representations.

Caravans (Fire Safety)

81. Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received from the caravan industry concerning the impact of the proposed Furniture and Furnishings (Fire Safety) Regulations upon the sale of new and secondhand units; and when he expects to make an announcement upon the subject.

Mr. Butcher: I made an announcement on 29 June at columns 382-3.

Mobile Phones

85. Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made of the need for further research in the field of mobile phone technology.

Mr. Butcher: The dynamic growth of the United Kingdom cellular radio market demonstrates the demand for mobile telephony. Despite the advent of digital cellular technology in 1991, new technologies and means of exploiting new radio frequencies will be needed to meet the growth of demand well into the 1990s.

Relevant research of limited scope is provided for under the EC RACE programme, but the main RACE priority is integrated broadband networks. The LINK programme of research in personal communications which we recently announced is therefore designed to supplement the RACE activity. Our ambition is nothing less than offering the consumer a real choice of local telephone connection much sooner as a result of intensifying collaborative research. I hope our European partners will put increased resources into mobile radio R and D in due course.

Electrical Appliance (Plugs)

86. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will introduce regulations to require the fitting of electrical plugs to all household electrical appliances as standard by the manufacturers of such products.

Mr. Butcher: No. This is a question for manufacturers or retailers to decide in the light of consumer demand.

Support for Design Scheme

88. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what evaluation there has been of his support for design scheme.

Mr. Butcher: An independent evaluation report on the support for design scheme was published on 21 June. It shows the scheme to have been beneficial and cost effective. Full account was taken of it in planning the consultancy elements of the enterprise initiative. Such evaluation is important to ensure that our services to industry are an effective use of public funds.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

Research and Development

92. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his estimate of the total expenditure on civil research and development during the last three years in the United Kingdom; and what equivalent figures he has for (a) the Federal Republic of Germany, and (b) France.

Mr. Butcher: The available information relates to 1985. For that year the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) has estimated gross expenditure on research and development (R and D), performed in a number of member countries, excluding expenditure on R and D for defence purposes, financed by national Defence Ministries. For the United Kingdom this was £6·4 billion, for the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) £10·8 billion and for France £6·8 billion. Expenditure for the FRG and France has been converted from national currencies to pound sterling using purchasing power parities calculated by OECD.

Knitwear and Hosiery Industry, Leicester

93. Mr. Janner: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will make a statement concerning his policy towards support for the knitwear and hosiery industry in Leicester.

Mr. Atkins: The Government's policy is to help firms to help themselves. Eligible firms are able to apply for assistance with consultancies under the enterprise initiative. They may, for example, seek help for exporting, research and technology, and for consultancy support for further development of their business.

Financial support under the textile and clothing education equipment scheme has been provided to Leicester polytechnic. In the inner cities context, the potential for the possible development of training and employment packages has been explored with local organisations by the Government's Highfields task force. As a result the task force is supporting a number of projects including the refurbishment of new premises for the Textile Arts Centre Ltd.; this will offer an additional 15 weaving and knitting YTS places and in-house training to City and Guilds standard. Task force support for the local Shama women's centre has resulted in 70 hosiery and knitwear overlocking and lock-stitching training places being provided.

The knitwear industry also benefits from the provisions of the multi-fibre arrangement and other trade agreements limiting imports from low-cost countries.

Gas Prices (Report)

97. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on gas prices for industrial consumers to be published.

Mr. Maude: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission is due to submit a report to my right hon. and noble Friend on the supply of gas to contract customers by 24 August 1988. The report will be published as soon as practicable after it has been submitted and considered.

Manufacturing Trade Deficit

98. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative trade deficit in manufactures so far in the current year.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the five months ended May, trade on manufactures was in deficit by £5·2 billion.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cumulative trade deficit in manufactures so far this year; and what steps are being taken to improve it.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months ended May, the current account was in deficit by £7·1 billion. The trade balance can be affected by a variety of market factors, but the Government will stick to the firm monetary and fiscal policies essential to strong economic performance. Wherever practicable my Department is ready to give assistance to firms seeking to improve their competitive strength and trade performance, as, for example, through the recently introduced enterprise initiative.

Manufacturing Trade Balance

101. Dr. Reid: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the change in the manufacturing trade balance since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: Trade in manufactures on a balance of payments basis was in surplus by £2·8 billion in 1979 and in deficit by £6·5 billion in 1987.

Furs (Labelling)

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement about the labelling of furs.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) on 20 June, at columns 404-405, in which I indicated that, because of legal difficulties which had been raised, it would not be possible to proceed with the proposed Fur Marking Order in the way originally envisaged. I understand, however, that the European Commission is considering action on this subject. Commissioner Clinton Davis announced on 5 July that it was looking carefully at the idea that furs imported into Europe should bear labels indicating whether those who trapped the animals used leg-hold traps.

Education and Teaching (Inner-city Policy)

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning education and teaching and inner-city policy and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Existing and potential inner-city employers frequently emphasise to me the importance of education and training in enabling inner-city residents to take advantage of the growing number of employment opportunities. The Government are encouraging links between inner-city schools and employers through, for example, compacts which assure school leavers who reach required standards of a job or job interview. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is offering financial support for a further 12 compacts in inner-city areas in England. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has recognised the importance of providing good science and technology-based education for inner-city children by promoting city technology colleges and all inner-city schools will benefit from his education reforms and introduction of the new national curriculum.

Safety Footwear

Mr. Fry: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will take steps to ensure that the proposed common European standard for safety footwear will allow for all types of construction, particularly welted footwear.

Mr. Butcher: The BSI will ensure that United Kingdom safety footwear manufacturers' interests are taken into account in the framing of a common European standard.

Departmental Shareholdings

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list all shareholdings in public and private companies still held by his Department.

Mr. Butcher: Listed are details of all shares and other securities held by my Department as at 31 March 1988. Also shown are the details for 31 March 1987. This information is published annually in the "Supplementary Statements to the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Fund".

[1] These shares were transferred to Vickers plc. for a nominal consideration.
[2] The holding of 25p ordinary shares reported at 31 March 1987 was converted to 20p ordinary shares as a prelude to the April 1987 privatisation.
[3] The 31 March 1987 holdings, previously reported with a nominal value of £4,753, have since been found to have been understated.

Export Promotion

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what were the main conclusions reached by his Department's central policy unit in its review of export promotion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. The review was part of my Department's advice upon the policy that my right hon. and noble Friend could consider adopting towards export services.

Computer Work Stations

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many computer work stations there are in his Department; what is the ratio of work stations to civil servants; and how he expects this to change over the next five years.

Mr. Butcher: Currently there are 4,000 computer work stations in the DTI. The ratio of work stations to civil servants is about 1:3. In five years' time the number of work stations could double to 8,000, resulting in a ratio of two work stations for every three civil servants. However, these future estimates are speculative.

Senior Information Technology Strategy Committee

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the composition of the senior information technology strategy committee in his Department; and how many times in the past year its meetings have been attended by Ministers.

Mr. Butcher: The Department's resource management group (RMG) oversees strategic decisions on departmental IT on the recommendations of the departmental committee on information technology (DECIT). RMG consists of the permanent secretary and deputy secretaries in the Department. DECIT has representatives from all the major IT user areas as well as the IT directorate and has a CCTA representative. If my hon. Friend wishes to have a full list of members, perhaps he will let me know and I will write to him. Ministers do not attend these committees but may discuss developments with senior officials as necessary.

Departmental Staff Training

Mr. Warren: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many of the staff in his Department at grades 1, 2 and 3 have attended courses or training on information technology awareness or management in the last 12 months.

Mr. Butcher: In the financial year 1987-88 five staff at grade 3 level received training in information technology management.

Counsel's Opinion

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on how many occasions his Department has sought the opinion of independent counsel since 1979; and if he will list the subjects concerned.

Mr. Butcher: The information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Furthermore, the details of any subjects upon which the opinion of independent counsel has been sought by the solicitor to the Department since 1979 are confidential, and therefore could not be disclosed.

Legislative and Policy Plans

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his Department's practice with regard to progressing any legislative or policy plans where it is advised that they may be challenged under the European Convention on Human Rights.

Mr. Butcher: When consideration is being given to legislative and other proposals, full account is taken of the United Kingdom's obligations under the European convention on human rights and of any risk of challenge thereunder.

Allen and Hanbury Ltd v Generics (UK)

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what advice he has received from independent counsel as to whether the judgment of the House of Lords in Allen and Hanbury Ltd. v. Generics (UK) is conclusive of the question whether applications to settle terms for a licence of right under the Patents Act 1977 would give rise to property within the meaning of the European Convention on Human Rights; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: It is not the practice of the Government to respond to inquiries about the source of their legal advice.

Education (Inner-city Policy)

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has held concerning education and inner-city policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Existing and potential inner-city employers frequently emphasise to me the importance of education and training in enabling inner city residents to take advantage of the growing number of employment opportunities. The Government are encouraging links between inner-city schools and employers through, for example, compacts, which assure school leavers who reach required standards of a job or job interview. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is offering financial support for a further 12 compacts in inner-city areas in England. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has recognised the importance of providing good science and technology based education for inner-city children by promoting city technology colleges and all inner-city schools will benefit from his education reforms and introduction of the new national curriculum.

Privatisation

Mr. Mills: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his assessment of the results of his privatisation policy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's privatisation policy has been a considerable success. Companies exposed to the commercial disciplines and freed from political control become more efficient, self-reliant, flexible and responsible to their customers' needs. Privatisation has also led to wider share ownership giving people including employees in some of the industries concerned a direct stake in the success of British industry. I am pursuing the policy with plans for the privatisation of British Steel and Girobank, which I have already announced to the House, and my right hon. and noble Friend has successfully negotiated the return of the Rover Group to the private sector.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Carers

Mr. Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the most recent estimate available to him of the number of carers in Britain; and what proportion of these are known to service agencies and supported in their efforts.

Mrs. Currie: The most recent estimate of the number of carers in Britain comes from the carers data collected in the 1985 general household survey. This shows that one adult (that is, people in private households aged 16 years and over) in seven (14 per cent.) was providing informal care. Information on the proportion of these who are known to service agencies is not held centrally. However, the survey showed that 47 per cent. of the main dependants of carers received regular visits from a variety of health, social and voluntary services. Further information is contained in the informal carers report published by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Marginal Tax Rates

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) earners, (b) families and (c) families with children, have effective marginal tax rates in excess of 40 per cent. taking into account income tax, national insurance contributions and the withdrawal of income-related benefits.

Mr. Portillo: On the basis of the assumptions set out in "Impact of The Reformed Structure of Income Related Benefits" October 1987 (copies of which are in the Library), 585,000 couples and single people below pension age where the principal earner is in full-time work are estimated to have combined income tax and benefit withdrawal rates in excess of 40 per cent. Of these, 525,000 have children. Among the couples, it is estimated that in broad terms there might be between 65,000 and 70,000 spouses who may have combined rates in excess of 40 per cent.

Unemployment and Poverty Traps

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what effect his social security reforms have had on the unemployment and poverty traps.

Mr. Portillo: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) on 12 July at columns 172-73.

Benefits (Payment)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what alternative arrangements he has made for the payment of benefits after the closure of the Abingdon street post office, Burnham-on-Sea, Somerset.

Mr. Portillo: The main Burnham post office is only half a mile from the former Abingdon street post office, and additional staff have been provided there to cope with the increased callers.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied that competitive tendering for support services within the National Health Service is operating on the basis of free and fair competition; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Yes, I am satisfied. The Department's National Health Service procurement directorate, together with regional health authorities, has been charged with ensuring that this is so, with following up any complaints, and ensuring that corrective action is taken where appropriate. If my hon. Friend has any particular examples in mind I should be pleased to have details.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that health authorities should be required to give his Department prior notification of their intention to terminate a contract for hospital services with a private contractor; and if he will establish for those parties the right of appeal to his Department in the event of a dispute about the reasons for termination.

Mrs. Currie: This is essentially a contractual matter between the two parties involved. A district health authority is required to refer a proposal to terminate a contract prematurely to the appropriate regional health authority to ensure that all reasonable efforts have been made to get the contract to work. If the region agrees with the proposal it then has to consult the Department, setting out the reasons for the proposal. The contractor is free to discuss such proposals both with the regional health authority, and with the Department's National Health Service procurement directorate, in cases of dispute.

National Health Service (Complaints)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether family practitioner committees are intended to monitor complaints which they receive in a similar manner to that specified for district health authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Family practitioner committees are asked to review regularly the incidence and nature of complaints in their area. The decisions on all formal investigations are taken by the family practitioner committees. Reports of all cases dealt with informally are made to the family practitioner committees.

Life Expectancy

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to implement to ensure that the equality of life expectancy is increased in the north with the south.

Mrs. Currie: Geographic variation in life expectancy is a complex and long-standing phenomenon which must be viewed against the background of a steady improvement in the overall health of the nation. Health inequalities between regions are to be found in many countries. In terms of equality in age at death, England stands up well in international comparison.

Unhealthy lifestyles and unhealthy diets create major risks to health. We are determined that all social groups throughout the country should have the information they need to make wise choices to protect their health.

The Government have taken a number of steps to promote good health and to ensure the equitable distribution of health care resources. The Government have pursued a policy of allocating health authority resources so as to ensure, over time, equal opportunity of access to health care for people in equal need, using the resource allocation working party's approach. Substantial progress has been made in bringing regions closer to their RAWP targets, and this year all regions are within 4 per cent. of target. The review of the RAWP formula carried out by the NHS management board has explored the scope for improving the way in which the current formula measures relative need across the country. The resulting recommendations are being considered and an announcement will be made shortly.

Patients (Confidentiality)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take against those health authorities which break patients' confidentiality, by passing on information to private health companies and other organisations.

Mrs. Currie: I am not aware of any such breaches of confidentiality by health authorities, but if the hon. Member has details of specific examples I would be happy to have inquiries made.

NHS (40th Anniversary)

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much public money has been spent in England and Wales in celebrating the 40th anniversary of the National Health Service; and if he will list the health authorities which have held such celebrations.

Mr. Moore: I am aware that many health authorities have celebrated the anniversary in a variety of ways. However, details of individual health authorities' celebrations and related expenditure are not held centrally. The Department has spent the following sums of money from its administration vote:

£12,750 on a reception for long-serving Health Service staff;

£34,500 supporting a video produced by the National Association of Health Authorities for training and information purposes; and

£3,200 on an entrance hall exhibition for the reception and various headquarters buildings of my Department.

These sums relate to England only and I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for

Counsel's Opinion

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services on how many occasions his Department has sought the opinion of independent counsel since 1979; and if he will list the subjects concerned.

Mr. Moore: The Department regularly seeks the opinion of independent counsel over a wide range of civil litigation, criminal prosecutions, social security topics, health matters and employment law cases. The precise information requested is, however, not readily available and could be identified only at disproportionate cost. It would not be proper to reveal the precise nature of the problem on which the advice of counsel was sought in any particular instance.

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his Department's practice with regard to progressing any legislative or policy plans where it is advised that they may be challenged under the European convention on human rights.

Mr. Moore: When consideration is being given to legislative and other proposals, full account is taken of the United Kingdom's obligations under the European convention on human rights and of any risk of challenge thereunder.

Students (Medical and Dental Treatment)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in view of difficulties and costs which would otherwise be incurred, he will advise full-time students to seek medical and dental treatement during term-time rather than during vacations wherever possible.

Mrs. Currie: In general, people should seek advice and treatement whenever they feel the need to do so. Student grants are deemed to cover their requirements during the short vacations but not the long vacations. They could however claim exemption from charges at any time of the year on the grounds of low income.

Health Authorities (Publications)

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those health authorities which publish a newsletter or other periodical publications; and if he will list details of the cost thereof in each case.

Mrs. Currie: Many health authorities produce a variety of publications. Information on the numbers, types and frequency of publications and their associated production costs is not held centrally.

Sight Tests

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what statistical or other evidence, excluding that on trends in dental treatment, is available to him to support the Government's assertion that a charge will not deter people from having a sight test.

Mr. Newton: I refer the right hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on 11 February 1988 at column 351. It is also relevant to note that a study by the Economist advisory group has shown that the great majority of those using spectacle vouchers, "top up" the voucher values by an average of between £14-24 depending on the type of voucher, despite the fact that spectacles are available within voucher values.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions he has had with the major multiple opticians on their intentions over charging for sight tests; and what was their response.

Mr. Newton: I and my hon. Friends the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in the Lords have met representatives of a number of optical bodies including those representing the major corporate bodies, to listen to their views on the provisions of the Health and Medicines Bill relating to sight tests. The level of fees for private sight tests will be entirely a matter for the companies concerned. We have not received from them to date any specific indication of the fees they propose to charge.

Glaucoma and Diabetic Retinopathy

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the medical research which he has considered on referral rates for glaucoma and diabetic retinopathy;

(2) if he will list the medical research which he has considered on the early identification and treatment of macular degeneration.

Mr. Newton: We have recently received a considerable amount of information relating to research into the incidence of diseases of the eye. There has been extensive correspondence in the specialist journals concerning the results of various studies, much of which has been referred to in the course of proceedings on the Health and Medicines Bill.

Portsmouth and Havant (Drug Use)

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take in the light of the report from the Policy Studies Institute about illicit drug use in Portsmouth and Havant, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I have read the Policy Studies Institute report. The findings on the level of illicit drug use among school pupils and its greater incidence among smokers and drinkers are broadly in line with findings from the surveys commissioned by the Department of Health and Social Security, copies of which are in the Library.

The view of the Policy Studies Institute that the school survey suggests "that alarmist anti-drug publicity is more likely to attract vulnerable people to drugs than put them off" is quite astonishing. It did not ask the school sample any questions at all about the anti-drug advertising. Instead it concludes that, because children who claimed more risky, anti-authority type behaviour were more likely to have tried drugs, anti-drug advertising will not work. In the development of all the Government's campaigns we have been well aware of this risk and have therefore avoided creative executions with which young people could identify. The young man on the poster has not been used since 1986.

The Policy Studies Institute concludes that because most of the heroin users interviewed were critical of the campaign such publicity campaigns are counter-productive for many at risk. However, there is no evidence that it showed any of the advertising material to the drug users that it interviewed. Its sample did not represent the main target groups for the Government advertising. I understand that some 41 users were interviewed; all were hard drug users already heavily involved in drugs (31 were current heroin users, 40 had tried it. Fourteen were current needle users, 38 had used needles in the past). Nearly all were aged 20 or over.

Department of Health and Social Security research among drug users, conducted by Andrew Irving, has been far more extensive than the Policy Studies Institute research. In the most recent study 208 drug users, in five locations, aged between 14 and 24 were interviewed. The Government's anti-heroin campaign was mainly targeted at young people (aged 13 to 20) who might be tempted to try drugs, and surveys suggested that the most recent anti-injecting campaign also had a powerful effect on users.

Tracking by RBL involves regular sampling of about 700 young people. These evaluations show that the campaigns are being widely noticed, that young people are aware of the way in which heroin can damage their health, and relationships with other people, and that resistance to illicit drug use is high.

Whilst drug taking may be associated with under-age smoking and drinking, this does not imply that a combined campaign tracking all three issues would be appropriate. The Government's anti-drug campaign is not an isolated event and is but one element in its health promotion strategy. The HEA runs anti-smoking and anti-drinking educational programmes and so do local health and education authorities including those in Hampshire.

Endometriosis

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many reported cases of endometriosis there have been, by health authority, for the past two years.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 11 July 1988]: The latest centrally available information is from a 10 per cent. sample of in-patients treated in NHS hospitals in 1984 and 1985. The numbers treated in individual health authorities are too small for reliable estimates to be made. Regional figures are given in the table.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities (Equipment Donations)

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many bids for support were received by 29 April in response to the initiative of the Computer Board for Universities and Research Councils on equipment donations to universities; what was the total value of bids submitted; how many external sponsors for projects were involved in the bids; what is the number of bids in which each external sponsor is involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The initiative was designed to encourage the donation, loan or sale on special terms of computing and communications equipment to universities. The aim is to enhance the existing equipment base in these areas. A scheme of matching support was adopted whereby universities were invited to bid for grants to cover the maintenance costs of equipment made available through the initiative. By the closing date of 29 April for the first round of assessment, 23 bids had been received from 14 universities covering additional equipment valued at an approximate total price of £3,500,000. This valuation takes into account normal educational discounts: the list price would be significantly higher. The number of external sponsors was 15; of these one was involved in four bids, five in two bids and the remaining nine in one bid each. Universities have also been invited to bid in a second round of the initiative, the closing date for applications being 28 October 1988.

Premature Early Retirement Compensation Scheme

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if there are any plans to introduce a polytechnic premature early retirement compensation scheme in March 1989 or at any time prior to vesting day, after the September premature early retirement compensation scheme now in existence.

Mr. Jackson: Subject to the relevant statutory provisions, the offer of premature retirement terms will be for individual polytechnics to decide, under the provisions of the Education Reform Bill now before Parliament, once they assume responsibility for running their own affairs. The Government will consult the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council and other interested bodies in due course about whether it would be desirable to establish collective arrangements for sharing the costs of premature retirement compensation within the new polytechnics and colleges sector.

History and Religious Studies

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the syllabus and standard of examination of history and religious studies at general certificate of secondary education level.

Mrs. Rumbold: A small number of letters has been received about aspects of particular GCSE syllabuses in history and religious studies.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Butcher: It would be disproportionately expensive to provide the information requested; contracts awarded during 1987 were listed in my answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 31 March 1988, at columns 591-93.

Public Companies (Shareholdings)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he is considering seeking to lower the threshold of individual or corporate shareholdings at which a bid must be made.

Mr. Maude: There is no statutory provision requiring a bid to be made when a person's shareholding in a company reaches a certain threshold. The City code on takeovers and mergers contains provisions for mandatory offers to be made when a person or persons acting in concert own or control 30 per cent. or more of a company's voting shares. The City code is administered by the Panel on Takeovers and Mergers.

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he gathers on the extent of individual or corporate shareholdings exceeding 20 per cent. in major British public companies; and if he will publish it.

Mr. Maude: Under the Fair Trading Act 1973 the Director General of Fair Trading advises the Secretary of State when he believes that the acquisition of a partial shareholding constitutes a merger qualifying for investigation under that Act. Apart from this my Department does not monitor information on shareholdings in British public companies.

Single Market

Sir David Price: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what changes will be necessary in United Kingdom legislation in order to satisfy the harmonisation requirements of the European Community for the achievement of the single market in 1992.

Mr. Maude: Some measures required to complete the single market may require implementation by way of primary legislation. In other cases the United Kingdom may give effect to its obligations by subordinate legislation, in particular by use of the powers conferred on the Government by the European Communities Act 1972. The need for implementing legislation, whether primary or subordinate, will be determined on a case by case basis.

Film Industry

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) how much was paid by his Department to the National Film Development Agency in 1987-88; and what is the proposed payment for 1988-89;

(2) how much was paid by his Department to British Screen Finance Ltd. in 1987-88; and what is the proposed payment for 1988-89.

Mr. Butcher: In 1987-88 the Department of Trade and Industry spent £2 million on the film support schemes administered by British Screen Finance Ltd. and the National Film Development Fund. Of that sum, £1,760,000 was paid in respect of the feature films and short films financing schemes run by BSF, and the remaining £240,000 was paid in respect of the project development scheme managed by the NFDF.

There is provision, in any one year, for funds to be switched between the short films and project development schemes. I am not therefore in a position to give the breakdown of funding for 1988-89. However, I would expect that total expenditure on BSF and NFDF schemes combined will amount to the maximum of £2 million allocated for this purpose.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much the United Kingdom earned from the export trade of its commercial film industry in 1987-88.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information in respect of the overseas earnings of the United Kingdom film companies relates to 1986, details of which were published in British Business, 2 October 1987. Results for 1987 are expected to be published in British Business in September.

Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received seeking an amendment to the Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill [Lords] to provide that composers, publishers and authors should be entitled to compensation for royalty income lost through multiple rental of copyright works; what response he has made to such representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: We have had several representations from organisations seeking legal rights for authors and composers in respect of the rental of their works. However, we believe that the Bill's provisions are already sufficient to enable authors and composers to negotiate appropriate remuneration for such rental.

Nicaragua

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many trade missions supported by Government funds visited Nicaragua, for each year since 1974

Mr. Alan Clark: None. No applications for Government support were received during this period.

National Engineering Laboratory

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, (1) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for East Kilbride on 28 June, Official Report, column 169, if he will list those customers of the National Engineering Laboratory consulted by his Department and the date of those consultations;

(2) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for East Kilbride on 28 June, Official Report, column 169, if he will list the countries from which information was sought and research carried out in those countries;

(3) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for East Kilbride on 28 June, Official Report, column 169, if he will list the research organisations in the United Kingdom which were consulted by his Department and the date of those consultations.

Mr. Butcher: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 28 June, at column 169.

Chile

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the total amount of British investment in Chile for each year since 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information relates to United Kingdom direct investment in Chile and is given in the table. Portfolio investment is not available by country.

ENVIRONMENT

Rents

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the cumulative percentage increase for rents in the private sector since 1979.

Mrs. Roe: No direct measure is available of the increase in private housing rents since 1979, for the reasons outlined in my reply to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 27 June at column 156. However, from the figures given in that reply for unfurnished tenancies other than housing association tenancies, it is estimated that private rents in England rose by about 128 per cent. from 1979 to 1987.

Sulphur Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received seeking a Government commitment to reducing sulphur dioxide emissions from the United Kingdom by 26 per cent. by 1993, 46 per cent. by 1999 and 70 per cent. by 2003, based on the sulphur emission figures for 1980.

Mr. Moynihan: The figures quoted by the hon. Member are those which were initially proposed, for reductions in sulphur dioxide emissions from existing large combustion plants, by the German Presidency of the EC. As stated in my reply of 20 June to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) the United Kingdom recently reached agreement with its Community partners on a directive which will require the United Kingdom to reduce emissions of sulphur dioxide from existing large combustion plants, from 1980 levels, by 20 per cent. by 1993, 40 per cent. by 1998 and 60 per cent. by 2003.

Structure Plans

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local structure plans approved by his Department were approved without change.

Mr. Waldegrave: I assume the hon. Member is referring to county structure plans. None has been approved without some modification, but the extent of modifications varies greatly from case to case.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the dates on which each current local structure plan was approved and (b) the period for which each current local structure plan is in force.

Mr. Waldegrave: The table gives the dates of approval of current structure plans and alterations, and the period for which housing provision is made. Other policies may have different or indefinite time periods.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, for each local structure plan currently in force, the number of homes originally proposed by the local authority and the number finally approved.

Mr. Waldegrave: For structure plan alterations and replacement plans approved since 1 July 1985, the information requested is as set out in the table. Details of plans approved before this date could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Green Belt Land

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the environment if he will list by region and county the area of land designated as green belt up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in England.

Mr. Waldegrave: The table lists the area of approved green belts in each region in England in 1979 and in 1986, the latest date for which information has been collated (though there have been no major changes since then). Figures by county within a green belt could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. The general extent of each green belt is indicated in county structure plans. Detailed boundaries are defined in local plans, where they exist, or in old style development plans. Some detailed boundaries have not yet been settled, so areas are approximate.

Approved Green Belts

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the area of land, by region and county, designated as of outstanding natural beauty up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in England.

Mr. Moynihan: Because many areas of outstanding natural beauty straddle more than one county the information is not readily available by county and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. By DOE region, the relevant area designated under section 87 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 is as follows:

	Area in 1979 (sq km)	Area in 1987 (sq km)
Northern	129	[1]1,479
North West	910	[1]1,560

[1] Includes North Pennines, designated in December 1978 and confirmed with modifications on 7 June 1988.

Council Home Sales

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to amend the description of special adaptations to council homes which enable a council to refuse the right to buy.

Mrs. Roe: Paragraph 8 of schedule 5 to the Housing Act 1985 excludes from the right to buy houses and flats which have been altered in certain ways to make them suitable for occupation by disabled people. The Housing Bill does not amend these provisions, but if amendments are tabled they will be considered very carefully.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the totals of council homes completed by northern councils in each year since 1979; and what are the estimated totals for the next five years.

Mrs. Roe: The total number of dwellings completed by local authorities in the northern region (excluding Cumbria) for each year since 1979 is:

	Number
1979	4,417
1980	4,344
1981	2,330
1982	1,476
1983	1,492
1984	1,462
1985	1,177
1986	528
[1]1987	445

[1] First nine months.

Estimated totals for the next five years are not available. Estimates for the two forthcoming financial years were included in the local authorities' housing investment programme forms in 1987 and these totalled:

	Number
1988-89	811
1989-90	1,509

South-East Regional Aggregate Working Party

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list the membership of the south-east regional aggregate working party, the interest each member represents and the meetings held; and if he will publish a summary of their purposes, recent activities, decisions made and advice offered.

Mr. Trippier: The regional aggregates working parties are local authority groups which draw their membership from mineral planning authorities, the aggregate minerals industry and the appropriate Government Departments. The south-east regional aggregates working party is chaired by the county planning officer of Hertfordshire and the secretariat is provided by the London and South-East regional planning conference (Serplan). I have asked Serplan to provide my hon. Friend with the information he has asked for.

Prisons (Development)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all inquiries into proposed secure prisons and other penal institutions developments in the last five years, giving in each case where permission was refused his reasons for refusal.

Mr. Waldegrave: Two proposals for the development of prison establishments, at Ashford (Middlesex) and Woolwich, have been the subject of public local inquiries in the last five years. Both proposals were subsequently approved.

Roxby Gullet (Mining)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the authority which granted the original planning permission for mining at Roxby Gullet near Scunthorpe, and about the conditions attached to that permission.

Mr. Trippier: There are two planning permissions for mining at Roxby Gullet issued in 1953 and 1958 respectively. I shall write to the hon. Member enclosing copies.

Council Housing

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures showing the total expenditure on local authority housebuilding for each year since 1979 in terms of (i) current prices, (ii) 1988 prices and (iii) share of gross domestic product.

Mrs. Roe: The available estimates of capital expenditure on housebuilding by English local authorities are as follows:

	Current prices £ million	1987-88 prices £ million	Percentage share of gross domestic product
1978-79	1,096	2,245	0·63
1979-80	1,065	1,867	0·52
1980-81	965	1,427	0·41
1981-82	720	969	0·28
1982-83	685	861	0·24
1983-84	682	819	0·22
1984-85	730	838	0·22
1985-86	579	628	0·16
1986-87	458	480	0·12
[1]1987-88	467	467	0·11

[1] Provisional.

Nuclear Waste (Disposal)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in which areas of the United Kingdom the British Geological Survey has been working since November 1987 in respect of UK Nirex's search for a suitable site for a nuclear waste disposal facility; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I understand from UK Nirex Ltd. that British Geological Survey's work has concentrated on the geological areas identified in Nirex's discussion document "The Way Forward" as potentially suitable for the development of a radioactive waste disposal facility.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish what information he has of the radioactive waste management programmes of Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development member states, indicating which have established organisations for the management of such waste, which are operating (i) low, (ii) intermediate and (iii) high level repositories and which one engaged for the search for sites.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the "International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Fact Book" published by the United States Department of Energy which contains information on those member countries of the OECD which have a nuclear power programme. I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Rent Debt (Calderdale)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what conclusions were reached by his Department on the escalation in rent debt in Calderdale in the first nine weeks of the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe: It is for individual authorities to take timely and appropriate steps to control and reduce rent arrears.

Aggregate

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his policy on stimulation of the production of aggregate from less environmentally sensitive sources and to avoid, so far as possible, environmental and social costs, remains as set out in the Department of the Environment circular 21/82.

Mr. Trippier: Government policy on the supply of aggregates is set out in circular 21/82. However this needs to be read with more recent policy statements on such matters as the development plan system and agricultural land. These are referred to in minerals planning guidance note 1 (general considerations and the development plan system) which was published by HMSO earlier this year.

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, prior to issuing a revised version of the Department of the Environment circular 21/82 entitled "Guidelines for Aggregates Provision in England and Wales," he will issue a Green Paper on the subject to permit full consideration of the views of all those likely to be affected by the proposed changes.

Mr. Trippier: Revised guidelines for aggregates provision in England and Wales are being prepared and a draft for consultation will be issued shortly. A period of at least two months will be allowed for consultation.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he is giving to the establishment of the headquarters of the proposed National Rivers Authority on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The location of the National Rivers Authority's headquarters is one of the matters on which the Government expect to receive advice from the National Rivers Authority advisory committee.

Movement and Dance

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current amount of funding by the Sports Council to the organisations of movement and dance; what are the future funding proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Funding in 1987-88 by the Sports Council to the seven recognised governing bodies of movement and dance was £181,508. In addition, the Sports Council gave regional capital grants to a total of £5,000 in 1987-88 to movement and dance organisations. Grants to governing bodies are considered by the Sports Council following receipt of forward plans from these bodies. A total of £117,342 has so far been allocated to three movement and dance governing bodies for 1988-89. The council is still awaiting forward plans from the other four governing bodies.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's latest estimate of the number of participants in movement and dance.

Mr. Moynihan: The 1986 general household survey of sport and recreation estimates that 1·3 million of the adult population participate in movement and dance.

Disabled Employees

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons were recruited to work in his Department in 1987-88; and what percentage of those were disabled.

Mr. Ridley: Figures are readily available only for non-industrial staff. My Department (including the PSA) recruited 1,456 non-industrial staff in 1987-88 of whom 25 (1·7 per cent.) were registered disabled.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many persons currently work in his Department; and what percentage of those are disabled.

Mr. Ridley: Figures are readily available only for non-industrial staff. At 1 June 1988, the non-industrial staff of my Department (including the PSA) numbered 20,818 of whom 266 (1·3 per cent.) were registered disabled.

PRIME MINISTER

Westland plc

Q65. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on co-ordination between the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry of Government policy towards support for the helicopter industry, in the light of the proposed sale by Fiat to United Technologies Corporation of its stake in Westland plc.

The Prime Minister: The Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry maintain close co-ordination on a wide range of defence and industrial issues. But the Government regard negotiations between Fiat and United Technologies concerning their holdings in Westland as a matter for the companies.

Lothian Region

Q75. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make an official visit to Lothian region.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Rating Reform

Q80. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy to hold a referendum before implementation of the community charge.

The Prime Minister: No.

Government Decentralisation

Q85. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will take further steps to decentralise the work of Government.

The Prime Minister: Under our next steps initiative, to the greatest extent practicable, responsibility for the day-to-day operations of the executive functions of Government will in future be delegated to executive agencies. The Government are now developing a progressive programme for establishing agencies. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Privy Council Office, will make a statement on the progress of this initiative before the recess.

Terrorism

Q90. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Prime Minister what response she has had from other Governments on curbing finance for international terrorism.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has announced that we intend in the forthcoming legislative proposals to replace the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 to broaden and strengthen our attack on terrorist funding. He has outlined these proposals to his colleagues in the Trevi forum and they have agreed that Trevi should study ways of confiscating funds intended to support terrorism. Our proposals will provide a starting point for this study. There has also been some work on this topic in the European political co-operation forum to establish what legislative provisions exist at present in the EC countries.

Working Conditions

Mr. Wray: To ask the Prime Minister what specific instruction she has given to Government Departments for proposals to improve the health, safety and wage conditions of the British work force following the recent European Community call in Hanover to seek such improvements in all member countries.

The Prime Minister: As I reported to the House in my statement of 30 June, the Hanover Council welcomed the initiative taken under article 118A of the Single European Act to provide better protection for the health and safety of workers. The United Kingdom is playing a positive role in the programme of health and safety directives under article 118A. In line with current policies, the Department of Employment and the Health and Safety Commission continue to develop domestic proposals to improve the health and safety of workers.

As to wages, the European Council drew attention to the prospects offered by the single European market for increasing prosperity generally, including the prosperity of wage-earners.

Engagements

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Patnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Georgia

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he has considered to prevent the depletion of fish stocks in the area surrounding South Georgia.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on 21 June.

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what surveys have been carried out regarding the possible depletion of fish stocks in the area surrounding South Georgia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: In 1987 surveys of fish stocks around South Georgia were undertaken by two Spanish vessels and by a Polish vessel under charter to the United States Government. The scientific results obtained were instrumental in bringing about the successful negotiation in the convention for the conservation of Antarctic marine living resources (CCAMLR) of the first ever total allowable catch set for this fishery.

In early 1988 a British Antarctic Survey scientist on board the British trawler Lord Shackleton undertook research in these waters. The results will be presented at this year's plenary meeting of CCAMLR in October to support our arguments there for further conservation measures.

Nicaragua

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received on the closure of La Prensa and Radio Catolica by the Government of Nicaragua; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I understand that on 11 July the Sandinista Government announced the indefinite closing of Radio Catolica, citing its reporting of the opposition march of 10 July in Nandaime, during which the police detained 42 people and used tear gas. On the same day, the Nicaraguan Government closed La Prensa for 15 days, and announced the expulsion of the US ambassador and seven other United States diplomats from Nicaragua. We deplore these Nicaraguan actions. They are further evidence of Nicaraguan failure to comply with its obligations to democratisation under the Esquipulas II agreement.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Overseas Assets

18. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figures for the stock of United Kingdom net overseas assets both in value and as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figures for the stock of United Kingdom net overseas assets both in value and as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold).

Balance of Payments

19. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the trend in the balance of payments.

Mr. Lilley: The current account deficit was £1·6 billion in 1987 and is estimated to be £4·7 billion so far in 1988.

24. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to improve the balance of payments position: and if he will make a statement.

43. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take to bring about an improvement in Britain's balance of payments performance.

66. Mr. Radice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures are being taken to improve the balance of payments.

Mr. Major: Policy will continue to be directed to defeating inflation and encouraging enterprise.

31. Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the level of the current account deficit on the balance of payments that he now predicts for this financial year.

38. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what new estimates he has made for the balance of payments figures in 1988; and if he will make a statement.

62. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the level of the current account deficit on the balance of payments that he now predicts for this financial year.

68. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what level of current account deficit on balance of payments he now predicts for this financial year.

87. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much he would now revise his Budget estimates of the likely outturn this year for the balance of payments.

91. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most recent estimate of the current account balance of payments for 1988 in (a) visible trade and (b) invisibles.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the light of the most recent trade figures, he will revise his current estimate of the balance of payments deficit for 1988-89.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update his forecast for the 1988 current account deficit as given in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1988-89".

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give his latest estimate of the balance of payments for 1988-89.

Mr. Major: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already said, recent figures suggest that the current account deficit in 1988 may be larger than the £4 billion forecast at Budget time.

35. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the impact of the measures announced in his Budget on the balance of payments.

58. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for the impact of his Budget income tax changes on the level of manufactured imports in the present year.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave on 12 May 1988 to the hon. Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) and for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) at column 453.

55. Mr. Wall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has recently received about the level of the balance of payments deficit for the first few months of 1988.

Mr. Major: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations on this, as on a number of subjects.

67. Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest available figures in respect of the balance of payments; and what are the comparable figures for one and nine years ago.

Mr. Major: In the first five months of 1988 the current account deficit was £4·7 billion. In the same period a year ago, a surplus of £0·8 billion was recorded, while nine years ago a deficit of £0·6 billion was recorded.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he intends to take in relation to the current balance of payments position.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to take any measures to reduce the level of the balance of payments deficit.

Mr. Major: This Government will stick to firm monetary and fiscal policies. These, along with policies to encourage enterprise, will help to ensure continued economic prosperity. In particular, the current surge in domestic investment and lower tax rates will bring strong lasting benefit to United Kingdom trade performance.

Shareholders

20. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the number of shareholders in the United Kingdom.

34. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the number of shareholders in the United Kingdom.

45. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the number of shareholders in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: The most recent survey by the Treasury and the stock exchange estimated that 9 million people own shares, three times the number in 1979.

Manufacturing Investment

21. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest forecast for the growth of manufacturing investment in the United Kingdom in the current year.

44. Mr. Watts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest forecast for the growth of manufacturing investment in the United Kingdom in the current year.

Mr. Major: The June investment intentions survey from the DTI suggests that manufacturing investment will grow by 16 per cent. in 1988.

Interest Rates

22. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many interest rate changes have there been since the Budget.

Mr. Lilley: There have been eight changes in base rates since the Budget.

28. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the estimated cost to the Government of the last increase in interest rates.

Mr. Lilley: Interest rates were raised in order to maintain downward pressure on inflation. Lower inflation improves Government finances in the medium term.

30. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the level of interest rates in the United Kingdom and other Group of Seven countries.

Mr. Lilley: The table shows the level of bank base rates in the United Kingdom, and the nearest equivalent rates in the other Group of Seven countries.

Country	Type of rate	Bank rate Per cent.
United Kingdom	Bank base rate	10
United States	Major bank's prime rate	9
Japan	Central bank discount rate	2½
West Germany	Central bank discount rate	3
France	1st category paper rate	6½
Italy	Central bank discount rate	12½
Canada	Commercial bank rate	8¾

32. Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many interest rate changes there have been in the last six weeks.

48. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many interest rate changes there have been in the last six weeks.

Mr. Lilley: Bank basic rates have changed five times in the last six weeks.

Privatisation

23. Mr. Janman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the proportion of the state-owned commercial sector which will have been transferred to the private sector from 1979 to the end of this year.

56. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the proportion of the state-owned commercial sector which will have been transferred to the private sector from 1979 to the end of this year.

73. Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the proportion of the state-owned commercial sector which will have been transferred to the private sector from 1979 to the end of this year.

86. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the proportion of the state-owned commercial sector which will have been transferred to the private sector from 1979 to the end of this year.

Mr. Brooke: Around 40 per cent. of the state-owned sector of industry has been transferred to the private sector since 1979. The proportion which will have been transferred to the private sector by the end of this year depends on the timing of future privatisations, which has not yet been decided. When the further privatisations so far announced have been completed some 60 per cent. of the state-owned sector will have been transferred to the private sector.

92. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the progress of the privatisation programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government have privatised 17 major companies and returned around 40 per cent. of the state-owned sector of industry to the private sector since 1979. The privatisation programme is set to continue; the privatisations of British Steel and the electricity and water industries have already been announced.

Balance of Trade

25. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to make any provision in his fiscal policy to take account of the balance of trade.

Mr. Major: The prudent fiscal stance set at Budget time will be maintained.

39. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's balance of trade.

Mr. Major: In the three months to May, the United Kingdom's balance of trade was in deficit by £3·9 billion.

72. Mr. McCleish: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has discussed policies to expand mutual trade between European countries with European Community Finance Ministers as a means of increasing United Kingdom visible exports and reducing the current trend to deficit in the United Kingdom trade balance.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend meets other European Community Finance Ministers from time to time to discuss a variety of matters.

Company Cars

26. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the increase in real terms in the taxation of company cars; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about this year's increase in the taxation of company cars.

Scottish Economy

27. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the performance of the Scottish economy.

Mr. Brooke: The Scottish economy is growing strongly across a broad range of sectors. The Fraser of Allander Institute has recently commented that "short-term prospects are more favourable than for some years".

Government Data Network

29. Mr. Wood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress with the proposed Government data network.

Mr. Brooke: The choice of Racal Data Networks Ltd. to provide the Government data network service was announced on 19 May at columns 572-73. Access contracts have now been signed with Racal Data Networks Ltd. to provide services to the Department of Health and Social Services, Inland Revenue, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Home Office. Racal Data Networks Ltd. is preparing for acceptance testing of the initial phase network, which is scheduled for completion early in 1989. Discussions are under way with other Departments considering using Government data network.

Public Spending

33. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimated level of public spending for 1989-90.

80. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the level of public spending he has now set for 1989-90.

Mr. Major: The Government's plans for public spending were published in the public expenditure White Paper "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1988-89 to 1990-91", Cm. 288, in January. This shows a planning total for 1989-90 of £167·1 billion.

64. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he expects the public spending outturn to be for 1988-89.

69. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he expects the public spending outturn to be for 1988-89.

93. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he now expects the public spending outturn to be for 1988-89.

95. Ms. Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he now expects the 1988-89 public spending outturn to be.

Mr. Major: The fist estimate of outturn for the 1988-89 planning total will be published in the 1988 Autumn Statement.

Tenders (Market Testing)

36. Mr. Soames: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the comulative benefit to the Exchequer of market testing of tenders for Government contracts by central Government since 1979.

Mr. Brooke: The cumulative rate of financial savings from the market testing of services by central Government Departments is estimated to have reached some £32 million a year by 1 April 1987.

Business Investment

37. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest forecast for the growth of business investment in the United Kindom in 1988.

51. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest forecast for the growth of business investment in the United Kingdom in 1988.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friends to the Budget forecast which projected a rise of 9 per cent. in the real level of business investment between 1987 and 1988.

Personal Disposable Income

40. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the increase in real personal disposable income in the year to the first quarter of 1988.

Mr. Major: Real personal disposable income was 5½ per cent. higher in the first quarter of 1988 than in the first quarter of 1987.

Take-home Pay

41. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the level of take-home pay obtained by the individuals receiving one half, one third, and two thirds of average earnings; and what were the equivalent figures two years ago.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The figures are given in the table. They are for a single person not contracted-out of SERPS.

	Take home pay 1986-87
	(1986-87 prices)	(1988-89 prices)	Take home pay 1988-89	Real Increase (per cent.)
½ average male earnings	58·17	62·88	67·44	7·2
⅔ average male earnings	79·30	85·72	93·28	8·8
⅓ average male earnings	101·84	110·08	120·73	9·7

Average earnings are for full time male workers aged over 21. (£213·80 in 1986-87 and £244·70 in 1988-89 assuming 6½ per cent. earnings growth on 1987-88).

Inflation

42. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of future inflation.

60. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of future inflation.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor will be publishing his next forecast of inflation at the usual time, in the Autumn Statement.

Tax Cuts (Imports)

46. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the impact of top rate tax cuts on imports.

47. Ms. Short: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the impact of top rate tax cuts on imports.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Members to the answer my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland).

Tax Changes

49. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) personal and (b) business taxes have been (i) lowered and (ii) abolished since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is not possible to draw a rigid distinction between personal and business taxes; income tax, for example, is paid by individuals, trusts and unincorporated and certain other businesses.

Five major taxes have been abolished since 1979: investment income surcharge, national insurance surcharge, development land tax, capital transfer tax on most lifetime gifts and capital duty. In addition, a number of lesser imposts (such as minor stamp and excise duties) have been abolished.

Of the taxes that remain, the basic rate of income tax has been reduced in stages from 33p to 25p since 1979 while the nine higher rates running up to 83 per cent. have been replaced by a single higher rate of 40 per cent. The main personal allowances have been increased by over 25 per cent. in real terms. Only real capital gains accruing since 1982 are now taxed, at the same rates as income. Capital transfer tax has been replaced by inheritance tax; fourteen rates running up to 75 per cent. in 1979 have been replaced by a single rate of 40 per cent. now, and the threshold is more than twice as high in real terms. In the context of a major reform of company taxation, the corporation tax rate has been reduced in stages from 52 to 35 per cent. The small companies' rate has been cut from 42 to 25 per cent. The main ad valorem stamp duties were halved in 1984 and the duty on share transactions was halved again in 1986. In addition, a number of reliefs have been introduced or improved upon, in particular to foster enterprise and encourage charitable giving.

Productivity

50. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average annual increase in the productivity of the whole United Kingdom economy since 1980.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe).

Annuities (Owner-occupiers)

52. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to encourage retired owner-occupiers on low incomes to unlock the capital tied up in their home by mortgaging the property and using the proceeds to purchase an annuity.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Tax relief is already available for interest paid by people aged 65 or more on loans, secured on their homes, which are used to buy a life annuity.

VAT

53. Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received in favour of zero rating value added tax on hospital radio broadcasting equipment.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend has received no further representations since the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 16 June at column 262.

71. Sir John Farr: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will include the Meat and Livestock Commission in the list of public bodies able to recover value added tax on their non-business expenditure.

Mr. Lilley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 12 July at columns 99-100.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what provisional or other timetable has been proposed by the Presidency or Commission of the European Economic Community, or proposed or adopted to or by its Council of Ministers, in respect of the harmonisation of value added tax of those funds, goods and services zero rated or exempt in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 July 1988]: The European Commission considers that member states' VAT rates should be "approximated" by 31 December 1992; but successive European Councils have not regarded tax approximation as a priority area and have set no specific timetable. The United Kingdom Government have made it clear that they do not consider tax approximation to be necessary for the completion of the single market. It could not be introduced without unanimous consent of all member states.

Self-employment

54. Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in self-employment since 1979.

65. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in self-employment since 1979.

75. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in self-employment since 1979.

Mr. Major: Since 1979 self-employment has increased by more than 1 million, or over 50 per cent., which is more than six times as much as in the previous 30 years.

Economic Outlook

57. Mr. Knox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the economic outlook for the remainder of the current financial year.

Mr. Major: The United Kingdom economy has achieved strong economic growth, low inflation and sound public finance. This combination is set to continue.

OECD Countries (Budget Surplus)

59. Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many other countries in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development are running a budget surplus.

Mr. Lilley: As well as the United Kingdom, Australia, Denmark, Norway and Sweden are expected to have a budget surplus in the current year.

Tax and Prices Index

61. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the rise in the tax and prices index in the 12 months to May.

Mr. Lilley: The tax and prices index rose by 2·1 per cent. in the 12 months to May.

Budget Strategy (Pay Settlements)

63. Mr. Madel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the implications of the current rate of pay settlements for the implementation of his Budget strategy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: The Government's policy of not accommodating domestic cost increases implies that excessive pay settlements are a threat to jobs rather than inflation over the medium term.

Economic Growth

70. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for economic growth in the United Kingdom in the next year.

Mr. Major: My right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's latest forecast was published at Budget time. It showed growth of 3 per cent. in whole economy output in 1988, equivalent to 3½ per cent. growth on a non-oil basis. However, as my right hon. Friend reported to the House on 16 June at column 554 it now looks as though growth in 1988 may prove slightly higher than this.

Aviation Gasoline

74. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current revenue raised from the duty on aviation gasoline.

Mr. Lilley: The revenue collected in 1987-88 was £3·5 million.

Economic Growth (Interest Rates)

76. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his assessment of the effect of the current instability of interest rates on investment in industry over the next year; and what assessment he has made of the effect this will have on the current level of economic growth in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Major: With interest rates close to their average levels for recent years, there is every sign that investment growth will be strong in 1988, as projected in the FSBR and the latest DTI investment intentions survey. This will contribute to the continuation of the strong and steady growth seen since 1981.

Departmental Telephone Numbers

77. Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to ensure that when Government Departments change their telephone numbers the correct information is made available to right hon. and hon. Members in due time.

Mr. Brooke: None, directly. It is the responsibility of the particular Department to advise its contacts when telephone numbers are changed.

Government Expenditure

78. Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the planned path for general Government expenditure over the period to 1990-91.

Mr. Major: The Government's expenditure plans, as set out in the public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 288) show general Government expenditure (including privatisation proceeds) of £183 billion in 1988-89, £193 billion in 1989-90 and £202 billion in 1990-91. This represents a declining proportion of GDP.

Manufacturing Profitability

79. Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the rise in manufacturing profitability in 1987.

83. Mr. Page: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the rise in manufacturing profitability in 1987.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friends to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter).

Third World Debt

81. Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds he rejected the proposal by the French Government at the Toronto summit to write off one third of the official debt of the 20 least-developed African countries.

Mr. Lilley: On balance, a reduction in interest rates, as proposed in the Chancellor's initiative, offers greater short-term cash flow relief for the debtor than the French Government's proposal which involves earlier repayment of principal. The United Kingdom therefore considers it desirable to lower interest rates for those countries which qualify for debt relief.

Mercury Telecommunications Ltd.

82. Mr. Michael Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what conclusions the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency has reached about telecommunications services to other Government Departments in the light of the Government's evaluation of services offered by Mercury Telecommunications Ltd.

Mr. Brooke: The CCTA's study has shown that, given the current structure of telecommunications tariffs, Mercury will in many instances offer financial savings over British Telecom for exchange lines connected to large private telephone exchanges. For such exchanges in the Whitehall area for which it is responsible, the CCTA will be implementing a phased programme to replace half the BT exchange lines with Mercury lines.

Civil Service Job Location

84. Mr. Sackville: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Civil Service jobs are now located in the south-east.

Mr. Brooke: There were 225,700 civil servants located in the south-east on 1 April 1987. These are the latest centrally available figures.

Economic Output

85. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figures for the growth of economic output in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Major: Provisional CSO estimates suggest that the output-based measure of GDP increased by 5 per cent. between the first quarter of 1987 and the first quarter of 1988.

Economy (Supply Side)

88. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to improve the capacity of the supply side of the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Major: We have introduced a number of reforms to improve the supply performance of the economy by increasing competition and flexibility and sharpening incentives to enterprise and effort. These complement the medium-term financial strategy which sets the macro economic framework needed to control inflation and give business the confidence to expand.

Since 1979 we have cut personal tax rates sharply, bringing the basic rate down from 33p to 25p and sweeping away all higher rates above 40p; cut the main corporation tax rate to 35 per cent., one of the very lowest in the industrialised world; privatised nearly 40 per cent. of the state-owned commercial sector; trebled the number of shareholders; abolished credit controls and created one of the world's most open, competitive capital market centres; strengthened trade union democracy; ended incomes policies; increased value for money in the public sector; and swept away a battery of bureaucratic controls and regulations. We will continue to bring forward measures of this kind.

Eurotunnel

89. Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement on the tax treatment of complimentary journeys available to flotation shareholders in Eurotunnel.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have nothing to add to the answers I gave to similar questions on 3 December 1987 to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) at column 697 and on 23 November 1987 to my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East and for Dover (Mr. Shaw) at columns 67-68.

European Central Bank

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the proposals made by Governments in the European Community for a European central bank.

Mr. Lilley: I would refer the hon. Member to the Prime Minister's statement of Thursday 30 June on the outcome of the European Council in Hanover on 27-28 June at columns 525-26.

Building Society Accounts

Mr. Butler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the number of building society accounts currently in existence in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley: Information on the number of building society accounts is not available. The annual returns sent by building societies to the Building Societies Commission showed at the end of 1987 an aggregate of 42 million investing shareholders and 3.6 million creditors for deposits and loans. As people may hold more than one account, these figures do not represent the actual number of accounts.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost in revenue forgone of (a) mortgage interest relief, (b) superannuation contributions and (c) retirement annuity premiums, for each year since 1980; and if he will estimate for each year the number and percentage of owner occupiers who were in receipt of mortgage interest relief.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information is as follows. For 1983-84 onwards the figures for mortgage interest relief include the cost of relief given to non-taxpayers.

	Mortgage interest relief (£ million)	Estimated cost of Employees' contributions to occupational pension schemes (£ million)	Employers' contributions to occupational pension schemes [2] (£ million)	Retirement annuity premia (£ million)	Number of mortgagors (thousands)	Mortgagors as a percentage of all owner occupied dwellings (per cent.)

Retirement Annuity Premiums

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide, for retirement annuity premiums superannuation contributions tax relief, a breakdown of benefits for income bands on the same basis as that given in the answer to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) of 14 June on mortgage interest relief, Official Report, columns 147-48, giving additionally the percentage of tax units in each income band, and the percentage of tax units within each income band who receive the benefits of the relief; and if he will provide comparable figures for both income band and region of residence in 1985-86.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Available information is given in the table. Data for 1987-88 and provisional estimates are based on projections from the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes. Due to the small sample size it has been necessary to amalgamate certain income ranges.

Taxation

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Birkenhead, Official Report, 27 June, he will state what would be the gains if those are average incomes in each of the following categories for each tax year from 1979-80 onwards relative to the indexed 1978-79 tax system (a) the top 1 per cent., (b) the next 2 per cent. to 5 per cent., (c) the next 6 per cent. to 10 per cent., (d) the next 11 per cent. to 20 per cent., (e) the next 21 per cent. to 30 per cent., (f) the next 31 per cent. to 40 per cent., (g) the next 40 per cent. to 50 per cent. and (h) the lower 50 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates are not available in the precise form requested. For each financial year 1979-80 to 1988-89 the table shows the average gain/loss per tax unit compared with the 1978-79 tax regime. All estimates are based on a provisional 1988-89 income base projected from the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and all tax regimes are indexed to 1988-89 levels according to the statutory formula. The comparison therefore allows for budgetary changes in income tax since 1978-79 but not for changes in definition or any other factors which might affect the income base.

[2] All information is in terms of tax units, i.e. married couples are counted as one and their incomes combined.

[3] Average gains are calculated by reference to the estimated number who would be liable to pay tax under the indexed 1978-79 regime.

Income Tax

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what pecentage of income was paid in tax in 1979 and is paid currently by a married couple with two, three and four children respectively.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Income tax liability depends on the level of income. The information in the table relates to a married man on average earnings for males in full-time employment.

Income tax liability less child benefit[1] as a percentage of gross income for a married man on male average earnings[2]

	1978-79 per cent.	1988-89 per cent.
Married couple with
Two children aged under 11	14·4	11·0
Three children; two aged under 11, one aged 11-15	10·7	8·1
Four children; two aged under 11, one aged 11-15, one aged 16 or over	6·8	5·1

[1] Deducting child benefit of £2·57 per child per week in 1978-79 and £7·25 in 1988-89.

[2] £92·80 per week in 1978-79 and estimated at £244·70 per week in 1988-89.

The calculations assume that all income is earned income, that the wife has no earnings, and that no reliefs or allowances are claimed other than the married man's allowance.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the cost to Her Majesty's Treasury of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Brooke: The cost to the Treasury, excluding the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, was as follows:

Financial year	£ thousands
1984	144
1985	301
1986	220
1987	351

The figure for 1983 could be given only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in Her Majesty's Treasury as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Brooke: For the Treasury, excluding the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, there were no such contracts extant as at 1 January 1987.

Water (VAT)

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to respond to the European Court of Justice's ruling on value added tax with respect to all parts of the water industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: As I informed the House on 21 June at column 957, the Government are obliged to comply with the Court's ruling that the zero-rating of water and sewerage services supplied to industry and a number of other goods and services is not permitted under European Community law. Supplies to domestic consumers will not be affected and no changes to the VAT law to give effect to the judgment will take effect before 1 April 1989. A consultation paper on this and other aspects of the judgment apart from non-domestic construction was issued by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise on 30 June and placed in the Library.

Civil Service (Staff Relations)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps are being taken to improve staff relations, arbitration and joint consultation in the Civil Service; and what guidelines are being issued to Civil Service managers.

Mr. Brooke: Collective relations within the Civil Service continue under the long-established machinery of the national Whitley council, in the case of non-industrial civil servants, and the joint co-ordinating committee for Government industrial establishments, in the case of industrial civil servants. Under the Whitley machinery dialogue is continuing with the Council of Civil Service Unions on whether central guidance about consultation might be appropriate.

Local Pay Additions

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to take any steps to rationalise the payment of local pay additions across Departments.

Mr. Brooke: No. It is for Departments to decide, within the scheme's guidelines and subject to Treasury approval, the plan which best meets their individual recruitment and retention needs.

CBI

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to meet the director general of the Confederation of British Industry; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Major: My right hon. Friend meets the director general of the CBI from time to time, and a wide range of subjects are discussed. He has no specific plans to meet him in the foreseeable future.

Member's Questions

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the hon. Member for South Shields can expect to receive an answer to his questions tabled for ordinary written answers on 29 June concerning the value added tax treatment of (a) the Apple and Pear Development Council and (b) the Meat and Livestock Commission.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave on Tuesday 12 July 1988 at columns 99-100.

Turkey

Miss Lestor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of debt relief given to Turkey in each of the years between 1978 and the latest year for which figures are available, for both calendar and financial years.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 5 July 1988]: Since 1978 the United Kingdom has rescheduled the following amounts of aid loans and officially guaranteed debts as part of the three multilateral Paris Club rescheduling operations for Turkey:

Amount rescheduled

Year	£ million
1978	35.3
1979	11.5
1980	108.1

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will detail for the latest available year the gains to (a) individuals and (b) income groups for each of the following categories who are claiming mortage interest relief, those earning per year (a) less than £5,000, (b) £5,001 to £7,500, (c) £7,501 to £10,000, (d) £10,001 to £12,500, (e) £12,501 to £15,000, (f) £15,001 to £17,500,

(g) £17,501 to £20,000, (h) £20,001 to £22,000, (i) £22,501 to £25,000, (j) £25,001 to £27,500, (k) £30,000 to £40,000, (l) £40,001 to £50,000 and (m) above £50,000 per year; together with the numbers claiming in each income group.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 5 July 1988]: Provisional estimates for the United Kingdom are given in the table. These are based on projections to 1988-89 of information in the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and the 1985 family expenditure survey. The estimates include mortgages formerly under the option mortgage scheme which are now subsumed under MIRAS.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the cost on revenue each year since 1979 for each of the following tax allowances: (a) mortgage interest relief, (b) retirement annuity relief, (c) approved pension schemes, (d) employers' contributions to funded pension schemes, (e) exemption of investment income from pension funds and (f) exemption of lump-sum payments for pension funds.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 5 July 1988]: The available information is as follows. Figures for 1983-84 onwards for mortgage interest relief include the cost of relief given to non-taxpayers.

Customs Procedures

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has as to how British Customs procedures, on trains and elsewhere, differ from those of other European Economic Community countries; and what proposals there are for change.

Mr. Lawson [holding answer 6 July 1988]: Detailed information is not readily available about how Customs procedures here differ from those of other EC countries, but I understand that Customs checks are carried out on board some trains crossing the frontiers of certain other member states.

Section 12 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 provides for Customs and immigration checks to be undertaken on board international trains going beyond London, subject to adequate facilities being provided. Discussions are at present taking place with British Rail about the facilities that would be required.

Harrods Trust

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on whether the Bank of England has recently authorised Harrods Trust to extend its banking activities, and as to where the ultimate control of the trust resides; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 July 1988]: Harrods Trust Limited is authorised under the Banking Act 1987. The Bank of England has a statutory duty to supervise all institutions authorised under the Act. That supervisory relationship is subject to Banking Act confidentiality and therefore it would not be appropriate for me to comment on this particular institution. The ultimate holding company of Harrods Trust and the registered and beneficial owners of the issued share capital of that company, are set out in the latest audited accounts submitted to Companies House.

DEFENCE

Arms Exporting Countries

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the top five arms exporting countries in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Sainsbury: Our estimates indicate that, based on the value of new contracts signed, the top five defence exporters for 1987 were:

United States of America
Soviet Bloc
United Kingdom
France
People's Republic of China

RAF Bases (Scotland)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many officers, non-commissioned officers and other ranks are currently stationed at RAF Leuchars;

(2) how many Royal Air Force installations and bases there are in Scotland; and how many officers, non-commissioned officers and other ranks are currently stationed at each of them.

Mr. Freeman: It would not be in the public interest to provide details of the number of personnel in individual defence establishments. As at 1 January 1988 there were 7,950 Royal Air Force personnel stationed at defence establishments in Scotland.

Low Flying

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will immediately order all military forces involved in low-flying exercises to stop all flying below 300 m.

Mr. Freeman: No.

Wessex Helicopters

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number and respective ages of Wessex helicopters assigned to the Queen's flight; what other helicopters are in service with the flight; and what plans he has for replacing these aircraft.

Mr. Freeman: There are two Wessex helicopters assigned to the Queen's flight, both of which are 19 years old, which is relatively young compared to other Wessex helicopters in service. There are no plans for replacing the Queen's flight Wessex helicopters in the immediate future. There are no other helicopters in service with the Queen's flight.

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number and respective ages of Wessex helicopters assigned to search and rescue duties within the United Kingdom, listing their home-bases.

Mr. Freeman: The in-service dates of the Wessex aircraft currently assigned to search and rescue (SAR) duties within the United Kingdom are as follows:

RAF Chivenor—1965 x 1, 1966 x 1
RAF Leuchars—1964 x 1, 1968 x 1
RAF Manston—1965 x 1, 1966 x 1
RAF Valley—1968 x 2
RAF Valley (SAR helicopter Training Unit)
1963 x 2
1964 x 1
1968 x 2
RAF Finningley (SAR helicopter Maintenance Unit)
1963 x 1
1964 x 1
1966 x 2
1967 x 1

In addition, one SAR Wessex helicopter (in-service date 1966) is currently with the manufacturer for maintenance.

Mr. Victor Adams (Compensation)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when, pursuant to his answer of 11 July, the claim for compensation from Mr. Victor Adams was received by his Department; when compensation was paid; in respect of what damage sustained by Mr. Adams the compensation was paid; how many similar claims have been received; what conditions were attached to the compensation paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: A claim for compensation for personal injury was received by the Ministry of Defence from solicitors acting for Mr. Victor Adams in March. The claim was dealt with on the basis of legal liability, and was settled on 17 May. It is not our practice to discuss details of individual settlements, the terms of which must be regarded as private between the Department, the claimant and his legal advisers. No other claims for personal injury have been received following the incident in question.

Aero Technologies

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what contracts Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes has received from his Department; what procedures are involved in the issuing of licences to firms undertaking defence or arms-related work in the United Kingdom; and what system of monitoring exits within the procurement division of his Department to ensure that firms satisfy all the statutory and legal obligations and employment conditions;

(2) what assessment he has made of the implications for the continued operation of Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes as a defence contractor of the Crown investigation into allegations of illegal arms shipments to Iran, of the sale of secret documents and of the sale of laser-guided bombs to the middle east.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have no record of any headquarter contract having been placed with this company. The issue of arms export licences is not a matter for my Department. Enforcement of the law is a matter for the police or other relevant authorities. However, any case brought to our notice, would be carefully considered.

Beagling

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Army personnel are permitted to engage in beagling in duty hours.

Mr. Freeman: Beagling is regarded as a recreational activity and is not pursued in duty hours to the detriment of any military task.

Hunting

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Army personnel who hunt in duty hours use privately-owned horses and equipment.

Mr. Freeman: The use of privately owned horses and equipment is permitted.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Army personnel who hunt in off-duty hours are permitted to use Government property.

Mr. Freeman: Yes. Army equipment lent to an individual for participation in a sport is on the basis that there is no additional cost to public funds. In certain cases it is necessary for the individual or club to take out insurance to cover against loss or damage.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on how many occasions since December 1986 Army personnel have been engaged in fox hunting in duty hours;

(2) on how many occasions since December 1986 Army personnel have engaged in deer hunting in duty hours.

Mr. Freeman: I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave the hon. Lady on 22 March 1988 at column 114.

Empty Property

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of empty homes owned by his Department outside security areas in the Greater London area; if he will list them by London borough; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 11 July 1988]: There are currently 718 empty homes owned by my Department outside security areas in the Greater London area. The figures by London borough are as follows:

	Number
Barnet	86
Croydon	11
Ealing	1
Greenwich	110
Harrow	35
Hendon	190
Hillingdon	103
Hounslow	1
Kensington and Chelsea	3
Kingston-upon-Thames	74
Lambeth	25
Southwark	3
Sutton	2
Wandsworth	10
Westminster	64
	718

Three hundred and fifty-two of the empty properties are either undergoing or awaiting works services, or temporarily empty pending the arrival of new occupants; 232 are in the process of disposal.

THE ARTS

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will give the cost to his Office of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Luce: The Office of Arts and Libraries was established in July 1983. No management consultants have been employed, but during this period expenditure of £25,691 was incurred in 1987-88 on a computer consultancy for the Government art collection.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Luce: No computer or management consultancy was extant in my Department at 1 January 1987.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Body Samples

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what safeguards there will be for suspects from whom the Royal Ulster Constabulary may wish to take body samples in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Justice Bill.

Mr. Stanley: I summarised the various safeguards at column 641 of the Official Report on 16 June when introducing the relevant amendments to the Criminal Justice Bill.

In addition, I am today placing in the Library of both Houses the code of practice for the identification by the Royal Ulster Constabulary of suspects by body samples, swabs and impressions.

This code of practice is based on chapter 5 (Identification by body samples, swabs and impressions) of the "Code of Practice for the Identification of Persons by Police Officers" issued for England and Wales under section 66 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average waiting time for interviews of sponsors living in the United Kingdom in relation to applications from relatives living in the Indian sub-continent after relatives have been interviewed abroad, at his Department's Birmingham office.

Mr. Renton: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to her question on 29 June, at column 234.

Official Secrets

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any public representations and comments in reaction to his recent proposals to reform the official secrets legislation.

Mr. John Patten: By 12 July we had received six letters from members of the public on the proposals set out in our White Paper.

Broadcasting Authorities

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met representatives of the broadcasting authorities; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend is in regular touch with the chairmen of the BBC and IBA on a wide range of broadcasting matters.

Asylum

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the new procedure regarding those arriving in the United Kingdom seeking refugee asylum.

Mr. Renton: A new procedure is being introduced for the referral of asylum cases to the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) on 4 July, at column 419.

Mr. and Mrs. Vadevalloo (Passports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will inquire into the circumstances of the delay in issuing a passport to Mr. J. Vadevalloo of 147 Brightwell avenue, Southend on Sea, Essex, date of birth 22 January 1948, who submitted his passport for renewal along with his wife's papers and the birth certificates of his three children.

Mr. Renton: Mrs. V. Vadevalloo's passport application was received at the London Passport Office with her husband's passport and the other supporting documents on 6 June. As the form indicated that she did not intend to travel until 8 September, the application was not given any priority. It was included in a batch of applications transferred last week to the Liverpool passport office for processing. Mrs. Vadevalloo's passport, and all the supporting documents were posted to her from Liverpool yesterday.

Secure Prisons

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report all sites which his Department have identified as suitable for new category B secure prisons in the north-west of England.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A large number of possible sites have been considered in the north-west for new category B prisons, as part of a general site search exercise covering the whole of England and Wales. A formal application for planning clearance has been made in respect of a site at Rochdale; and a written approach has been made to the local planning authority in respect of Prison Department land at Kirkham.

Licensing Act 1988

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out the proposed dates for the implementation of the various sections of the Licensing Act 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is intended that the commencement date for sections 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 16, 17 and 18 of the Licensing Act 1988 will be 1 August; that the remaining sections will be in force on or before 1 September, with the exception of sections 12 and 15, which are likely to be implemented on 1 March 1989.

Immigration Rules

Mr. Hattersley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many written and oral representations he has received urging him to reform immigration rules on family unity, particularly the primary purpose rule, the sole responsibility rule and the elderly parents rule so as to make it easier for families to be reunited in the United Kingdom; from which organisations and groups these representations have come; and what has been his response to such representations.

Mr. Renton: Over time there have been a number of written representations from hon. and right hon. Members and others, and the subjects have been raised variously at meetings, including one with a delegation led by the right hon. Gentleman last month. There are no present plans to change the relevant provisions of the immigration rules, although their operation is kept under review.

Women's Prison (Lancashire)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any future plans for a women's prison, remand centre and additional probation hostel within the boundaries of the Fylde, Wyre, Blackpool, North and Blackpool, South parliamentary constituencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no such plans at present.

Prison and Detention Accommodation

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in the Official Report by county the total numbers of persons who can be accommodated in (a) prison (b) remand (c) youth custody and (d) detention centres.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is set out in the table. Figures show the certified normal accommodation in each type of establishment in each county on 31 May 1988, the most recent date for which information is available.

Police Interviews (Tape Recording)

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, following representations received, he intends to amend the draft code of practice and guidance notes on tape recording of police interviews which were laid before Parliament on 14 June.

Mr. Hurd: I have now considered representations received about the code. I do not intend any change to the code itself but, following representations about one of the guidance notes which, while forming part of the printed document, is not a provision of the code, I have decided to modify guidance note 4M to further clarify the procedure to be followed should a tape break during an interview. I intend to add a new sentence after the second sentence in the note as follows:

"If equipment for copying the unbroken tape is not readily available both tapes should be sealed in the suspect's presence and the interview begun again."

Copies of the revised note have been placed in the Library.

I now intend as soon as possible to seek the approval by resolution of both Houses—as required under section 67 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984—to the order made by statutory instrument which will bring the code into operation and which was laid before Parliament yesterday. The code will not have effect in relation to any area until a further order is made in relation to that area under section 60(1) (b) of the 1984 Act.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Policy

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in the light of London Food Commission's food quality charter, he will make it his policy to co-ordinate a national food policy in order to ensure better and safer standards for food in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: It has always been our policy to ensure that consumers can enjoy a plentiful and varied supply of good quality, unadulterated food at affordable prices. We will continue to pursue this policy taking into account the advice from our independent expert advisory committees.

New Zealand Butter

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe of 11 July, he will give details to the House of the Government's views on New Zealand butter exports to the United Kingdom before communicating them to the European Commission; what steps he has taken to discover the response of the New Zealand Government to the views he will be putting forward; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government's general approach on future access for New Zealand butter was set by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the House on 19 May.

I maintain regular contact with Ministers and officials of the New Zealand Government and dairy board. Since the beginning of this year, for example, I have discussed this issue with the New Zealand Prime Minister, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Minister for Overseas Trade and the chairman of the New Zealand dairy board, as well as with officials of the New Zealand high commission. I also expect to see the New Zealand Minister for Overseas Trade again on 18 July.

Pigmeat

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Meat and Livestock Commission's proposal that expenditure on pigmeat promotion will fall from £3·4 million in 1988-89 to £2·5 million in 1990-91.

Mr. Donald Thomspon: I understand that the Meat and Livestock Commission's draft corporate plan, covering the period 1988-91, proposed expenditure on pigmeat promotion as indicated. The proposals in the corporate plan finally adopted by the Commission, following consultation with the industry, are £3·6 million in 1988-89 and £2·9 million in 1990-91. This compares with £2·5 million actually spent in 1987-88.

As with cattle and sheep, the MLC intends to reduce the allocation from the general levy income (which, of course, is used to fund other work on pigs, cattle and sheep) to promotion of the individual meats. Pigmeat promotion funds will become more reliant on income from the producer-funded levy. The corporate plan assumes increases in the species promotion levy on pigs, but it is for the Pork and Bacon Promotion Council to recommend —and the commission as a whole to decide—the actual rates of levy. The council, which consists of pig producers and other industry interests, has not yet recommended rates for 1989-90 or 1990-91. It will do so in the knowledge of the level of income likely to be generated.

TRANSPORT

Cross-Channel Ferries

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his Department's policy in future to conduct regular unannounced inspections of all cross-Channel ferries.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department's marine surveyors will continue to carry out random unannounced as well as announced inspections of cross-Channel ferries.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of every passenger safety certificate issued by local marine offices under the authority of his Department to P and O cross-Channel ferries in the last 13 months.

Mr. David Mitchell: The following P and O cross-Channel ferries have been issued with passenger and safety certificates in the last 13 months:

European Clearway, European Endeavour (formerly European Enterprise), European Trader, Pride of Bruges (formerly Pride of Free Enterprise), Pride of Calais, Pride of Canterbury (formerly Free Enterprise VIII), Pride of Dover, Pride of Hythe (formerly Free Enterprise V), Pride of Kent (formerly Spirit of Free Enterprise), Pride of Sandwich (formerly Free Enterprise VI), Pride of Walmer (formerly Free Enterprise VII), Viking Trader, Viking Valliant, Viking Venturer, Viking Viscount, Viking Voyager.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to include in the criteria by which a cross-Channel ferry is judged in any application for a passenger safety certificate the experience of crew members operating the vessel and hours worked by those crew before embarkation of each passenger complement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The procedures for the issue of a passenger and safety certificate to a cross-Channel ferry include a check on the statutory qualifications of the officers and the number of qualified persons required for emergency duties. The allocation of duties and hours worked between members of the crew is in the first instance a matter for the operator.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the structural requirements for shipping vessels, including life-saving equipment, with particular reference to cross-Channel ferries, in regard to the issue of a passenger safety certificate.

Mr. David Mitchell: The structural requirements for cross-Channel ferries are given in the Merchant Shipping (Passenger Ship Construction) Regulations 1980 or the Merchant Shipping (Passenger Ship Construction and Survey) Regulations 1984, as appropriate, depending upon the age of the ship. Details of the life-saving equipment to be carried on such ships are given in the Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Regulations 1980 or 1986 as appropriate.

Road Markings

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce mandatory reflectorised road markings similar to the scheme in West Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. The Department is currently working with the British Standards Institute towards the introduction of standards for retroreflective road markings.

Departmental Shareholdings

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all shareholdings in public and private companies still held by his Department.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is one 25p special share in the Isles of Scilly Steamship Company acquired in the late 1960s in order to protect the Government's financial interests. It enables the Secretary of State to appoint one director to the board of the company.

The following ordinary shares in public and private companies are held by the Department:

Company	Shareholding
British Airways plc	9,837,614 25p ordinary shares
BAA plc	21,828,280 25p ordinary shares
British Channel Tunnel Company plc	4,739,131 £1 ordinary shares
Mersey Docks and Harbour Company	4,137,265 10p ordinary shares

The shares in British Airways and BAA have been retained in order to pay the loyalty bonus in accordance with the terms set out in the prospectuses.

In addition, we retain one £1 special share in each of BAA, Mersey Docks and Harbour Company, and Sealink (the rights attaching to these shares are set out in the articles of association of the companies concerned). The Department also has holdings of four shares in each of BA Share Offer and BAA Share Offer, the unlimited companies established to receive application moneys during the flotations of British Airways and BAA.

Quangos and Trading Funds

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations and trading funds reporting to his Department.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is contained in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1987."

Blind Pedestrians (Road-crossing Aids)

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport where the tactile devices used to assist blind pedestrians to cross the road have been deployed; what have been the conclusions drawn from their experimental usage; and how soon he believes the equipment will be brought up to marketable standard.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Tactile units have been installed at sites in Birmingham, London, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Nottingham and Sheffield. The results of a questionnaire for members of blind organisations indicated that the great majority considered the units were easy to find and using the units made them more confident. Timing of the marketability of such equipment is a matter for manufacturers and customers.

Bridges

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost to local authorities and to his Department of the repair of all United Kingdom bridges to the standard recommended by his Department's document entitled "The assessment of Highway Bridges and Structures."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The bridge census and sample survey report of January 1987 estimated the cost of strengthening bridges on local authority roads in Great Britain to be some £700 million. The corresponding costs of strengthening trunk road bridges in England are estimated to be some £50 million. An element of these costs will fall to the statutory transport undertakings. The costs of strengthening trunk road bridges in Scotland and Wales and all bridges in Northern Ireland, are matters for the respective Secretaries of State. For information on the cost of ongoing maintenance to keep pace with deterioration, I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) on 11 July 1988 at columns 82-83.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what initiatives his Department has taken since the publication of the document entitled "The Assessment of Highway Bridges and Structures" to improve the quality of United Kingdom bridge stock.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A comprehensive programme for the rehabilitation of bridges on motorways and all-purpose trunk roads and follow-up discussions on the results of the census and sample survey of other bridges are now in progress as announced on 24 November 1987, at column 110.

Roadworks

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the latest available estimate of works costs for schemes listed in the White Paper "Policy for Roads in England: 1987" on which contracts have not yet been let.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is not available except at disproportionate cost. If my hon. Friend has a particular scheme in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Goods Vehicles (Overloading)

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider seeking to amend the Road Traffic Acts to enable road hauliers to seek a defence, if prosecuted, of due diligence in cases of overloaded heavy goods vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Road haulage operators are responsible for ensuring that they and their drivers observe the law on overloading.

Motorways (Capacity)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 11 July, he is in a position to provide the estimates on motorway capacity requested by the hon. Member for Northampton, North using the following illustrative assumptions: midsummer, five miles from the nearest junction, dry conditions, midday; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Not precisely in the conditions suggested. Observations have been made for the highest sustainable flow over a one-hour period in good conditions and with no disruptions such as accidents. For motorways the average speed of the traffic in these conditions was about 50 mph. When heavy goods vehicles constituted about 12 per cent. of the total traffic, the observed flows on three lanes was about 6,000 vehicles per hour.

M1 (Delays)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, what was the cause of delays in the south-bound carriageway of the M1 between junctions 15 and 8 between 21.00 hours and 23.59 hours on 10 July; by what date he anticipates road improvements to allow a significant relief in the congestion experienced at such a time and place and under such conditions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The cause appears to have been traffic from the British Grand Prix at Silverstone joining the M1 at junction 15, adding to the already very heavy traffic flows which are usual on Sunday evenings.

The M1 will be relieved with the completion by 1992 of the M40 extension to Birmingham.

Selby Bypass

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what results have been yielded from the soil survey and considerations of landscape and agricultural problems in connection with the proposed Selby bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The soil survey showed that there are extensive peat deposits at the eastern end of the proposed bypass. Measures to deal with this problem are being investigated.

Our scheme plans are being developed taking account of all aspects relevant to the design of a new road, including landscape and agriculture. Additional information has caused us now to consider localised variations to the preferred route.

Mr. Alison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he hopes to publish draft line and side road orders for the proposed Selby bypass.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The programme for this scheme has had to be reviewed in the light of survey findings and other fresh information. A new publication date for draft orders will be set when the implications have been assessed.

Road Safety

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his strategy and priorities for future action on road safety in the light of consultations about the report, "Road Safety: The Next Steps," published in July 1987.

Mr. Channon: There was wide support for the target which I set of reducing casualties by one third by the turn of the century, and for the proposals for redirecting resources to measures which can be shown directly to cut casualties.

Achieving the target depends on close co-operation between central and local government since 70 per cent. of casualties occur on local roads. Recently I agreed with the local authority leaders representing highway authorities new arrangements for taking forward road safety work jointly. We have agreed that the priority should be to reduce casualties among the most vulnerable road users —pedestrians, children, cyclists and motor cyclists—and that we should work together between now and the end of the year to find ways to expand the programme of low-cost road engineering schemes which will most benefit those groups. We will also work on setting local casualty reduction targets.

I have today placed in the Library of the House a copy of a discussion paper which I tabled at the meeting with the local authority leaders which summarises views expressed during the consultation exercise and action taken and planned in respect of each of the review's recommendations.

Flight Delays

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice he received from the Civil Aviation Authority on the likelihood of flight delays during the summer months; what number of delayed flights and number of passenger hours' delay were predicted; and how those forecasts relate to actual delays so far.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The authority advised my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in March of the intention of the National Air Traffic Services to apply flow management restrictions during the summer months of 1988, with the overall effect of reducing peak hour rates by 10 per cent. compared to those applying in 1987. The delays to flights caused by flow management restrictions imposed in the United Kingdom and elsewhere in Europe could not be quantified accurately in advance. NATS anticipated an increase compared to the average delay of 10 to 15 minutes experienced in 1987. Each summer season's activities are analysed by the CAA, in collaboration with other European air traffic services and representatives of both scheduled and charter airline operators, in order to identify bottlenecks and to seek the most beneficial traffic flows for the following season.

EMPLOYMENT

Factory Inspectorate

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average frequency of visits made by the factory inspectorate to workplaces in Wales in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of reported accidents is investigated by the factory inspectorate in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: In 1987-88, a total of 5·4 per cent. of accidents reported to the Health and Safety Executive's factory inspectorate in Wales were investigated.

Employment Training

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average cost of a training place on (a) the new employment training programme to begin in September and (b) the YTS at an annual ratio.

Mr. Cope: The average gross cost to the Exchequer of a training place per year is expected to be about £4,200 on employment training. On the latest available information a full training year on YTS costs an average of £2,600.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list unemployment levels as a percentage of work force for each of the European Economic Community countries and the United States of America, Sweden and Japan for each quarter since the first quarter of 1979.

Mr. Lee: Following is the available information. The tables show standardised unemployment rates published by the Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development where these are available for each quarter since 1979. The same information is not available for Ireland, Greece, Denmark and Luxembourg but annual averages for 1983-87, and rates for the first quarter of 1988 are given based on similar "harmonised" unemployment rates published by the statistical office of the European Communities.

Aero Technologies

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from employees of Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes on the non-payment of salaries and wages, redundancy payments and dismissal.

Mr. Nicholls: None.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will direct the Health and Safety Executive to investigate the conditions under which 2·5 tonnes of high explosives are stored at the Glenrothes factory of Aero Technologies, in the light of the current employee sit-in.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive is aware of the situation at the Glenrothes factory and is satisfied with the current safety and security arrangements at the site.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will prosecute the directors and owners of Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes for breaches of the Employment Acts relating to non-payment of salaries and wages.

Mr. Nicholls: I have no power to do so. Employees who believe that they are owed wages or salaries should seek redress in the civil courts.

Working Women

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of full-time working women in the northern region receive less than £100 a week.

Mr. Lee: The available information is published in table 13 of part A of the report on the new earnings survey 1987.

WALES

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he proposes to take to ensure the proportion of gross domestic product spent in Wales on the National Health Service is increased to the levels prevailing in the member states of the European Community.

Mr. Grist: This question appears to be based on a mistaken premise. In 1985—the latest year for which comprehensive information is available—the mean level of GDP spent on public sector health care in member states of the European Community (excluding Luxembourg) was 5·5 per cent. while the proportion of GDP spent in Wales on the NHS in 1985-86 was 7·3 per cent. Since 1985-86 the Government have increased spending on the NHS in Wales by nearly 16 per cent. in real terms.

House Buyers, Gwynedd

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps his Department is taking to help first-time house seekers in Gwynedd to secure a house to buy or rent at a price within their reach.

Mr. Grist: We require the Housing Corporation to take full account of the needs of rural areas. It has invested on average 25 per cent. of its allocation in housing for rent and low-cost home ownership schemes in such areas. In Gwynedd in particular in 1987-88 the corporation approved schemes to provide some 150 units of accommodation out of 650 in rural Wales. In the current year, with additional private finance, the allocation will provide over 280 units in Gwynedd. In addition, we have encouraged local authorities to use their considerable powers to provide homes for local people. Dwyfor district council has received additional allocations totalling £0·5 million for this purpose over the last three years.

New Houses

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, for each district authority in Wales, the number of new houses built in each of the last 10 years separately distinguishing (a) private and (b) non-private housing.

Mr. Grist: The required information on private and non-private housing completions from 1978 to 1986 is published in "Local Housing Statistics" copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Data for 1987 are given in the following table:—

Population Statistics

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the next 10 years at each level of geographical disaggregation available to his Department the projected population for Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: Population projections are made for counties of Wales. These are conterminous with district health authorities except for Dyfed, where separate assessments are made for East Dyfed and Pembrokeshire.

The projections currently available are made on the basis of the populations in 1985 and are given in the following table. The most recent information at the all-Wales level for 1986 suggests however that these estimates are on the low side. Projections based on 1987 information will, it is hoped, be made available towards the end of the year.

Contaminated Waste

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what steps he has taken to ensure that the tipping of contaminated wastes in the vicinity of Dark and Chapel lanes will not affect adversely the watercourses, the pastures, the crops and the livestock of adjacent fields; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take steps to compensate residents in Chapel and Dark lanes consequent upon the impact of tipping upon their general environment; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will meet residents of Chapel lane and Dark lane, near Rossett, Clwyd, to discuss the tipping of contaminated soils from Holland, unmarked drums and other substances; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will establish tests to ensure that the tipping of substances near Chapel lane and Dark lane is not injurious to the lungs, eyes and nervous systems of nearby residents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to him on 11 July at column 18.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales from what company or companies he has received applications to enlarge the extent of tipping at Chapel and Dark lanes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I have received no such applications. Any application would be made to the appropriate local authority.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has assessed the sufficiency of local or regional monitoring of the provision of services for mentally handicapped persons in Wales.

Mr. Grist: All county joint planning teams, which are responsible for the planning of services for people with mental handicap supported by funding made available under the all-Wales handicap strategy, assess the progress made in the development of those services. The Department meets the county joint planning teams annually to discuss the progress and planning of mental handicap services. Additionally, research teams based in the university of Wales college of medicine and the university college of North Wales, Bangor are undertaking an extensive programme of formal research to evaluate the development of mental handicap services; and the question of a system of independent review of these services is to be considered by the newly reconstituted all-Wales advisory panel on the development of services for people with a mental handicap.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in what way regional health authority strategic plans embody a commitment to the continuation of mental handicap nurse training in Wales.

Mr. Grist: District health authorities in Wales will shortly be formulating their second round strategic plans, and guidelines for their production will be issued in the spring 1989. Authorities will be expected to continue to develop services for people with mental handicaps, and support for and continuation of mental handicap nurse training will be an integral component in that process.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what provisions regions are making, as services move out into the community, to continue their commitment to mental handicap nurse training in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The strategy for nursing in Wales published by the Department in 1987 had as one of its objectives the development of a comprehensive system of progressional education to enable the profession to meet the changing needs of the population in Wales.

The change of emphasis in the care of people with mental handicaps as established in the all-Wales mental handicap strategy has demonstrated the need for different education and training for learners and further education for staff already trained. Health authorities are expected to take full account of this in the development of community based services for those with a mental handicap, and the issue is being monitored with authorities through the annual review process.

Information about health authorities' current proposals for future mental handicap training is currently being collated at the all-Wales level through a manpower resource planning exercise involving all health authorities and will be available later in the year.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many nurses entered into mental handicap nurse training for each of the past five years in each region in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Information relating to entrants into mental handicap nurse training is held by the Welsh National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting and is available by district health authority for four years as shown in the following table:

Notes:

1. Clwyd, East Dyfed, Pembrokeshire and West Glamorgan are not approved by the Welsh national board to run mental handicap registered or enrolled nurse training.
2. Years quoted in the table above are 1 April to 31 March.

Physiotherapy and Speech Therapy

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many pupils, respectively, in schools in each county of Wales, with statements under section 7(1) of the Education Act 1981, are in receipt of physiotherapy provisions as a result of the need indicated in that statement; and what proportion of those in need in each county that number constitutes;

(2) how many pupils, respectively, in schools in each county in Wales, with statements under section 7(1) of the Education Act 1981, are in receipt of speech therapy provision as a result of the need indicated in that statement; and what proportion of those in need in each county that number constitutes.

Mr. Grist: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he will take to reduce the shortage of speech therapists; if he will initiate measures to make the career of speech therapists more attractive to potential entrants; if he will make available extra moneys to ensure that the salary levels and status of speech therapists are improved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The manpower resource planning exercise currently being undertaken by all health authorities is intended to provide details of future requirements at the all Wales level in a number of staff groups, including speech therapy. When that exercise has been completed later this year, consideration will be given to what action should be taken to meet those requirements. A new pay and grading structure for speech therapists was introduced with effect from 1 January 1988. The management side of the scientific and professional council took account of the recruitment difficulties affecting the profession nationally and believes that the new structure will bring considerable benefits to the profession. In the current year the management side has offered a 5·5 per cent. increase in pay effective from 1 April 1988. The staff side is at present consulting its membership on this offer.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will launch a campaign to be handled by the careers service promoting careers in physiotherapy and speech therapy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Work is currently in hand on the preparation of revised recruitment literature promoting careers in the National Health Service generally. Within Wales, the manpower steering group established by the Department is giving consideration to measures to promote and encourage recruitment into the National Health Service in Wales. The need to target specific staff groups will be considered in the light of the outcome of the manpower resource planning exercise currently being undertaken by health authorities.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will call an all-Wales conference on speech therapy to discuss the deficiencies in speech therapy provision in schools in Wales and to prepare proposals to enhance provisions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The Welsh Office has asked health authorities through the manpower steering group to estimate how many speech therapists will be required by the National Health Service over the next 10 years and this should enable action to be taken where appropriate to meet those requirements.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will visit the speech therapy units in Clwyd local education authority county primary schools and specialist schools for the handicapped in Clwyd to discuss with parents the current shortage of qualified staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have any present plans to do so.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will seek to make it a statutory right for children to have sufficient speech therapy provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: We are not convinced that the introduction of a statutory right would lead to a significant improvement in the provision of speech therapy to children.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ascertain from local education authorities and health authorities the availability of physiotherapists' service for handicapped pupils in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The provision of physiotherapy for handicapped pupils is best determined by district health authorities in the light of their knowledge of local circumstances. The Welsh Office has asked health authorities to estimate how many physiotherapists will be required by the National Health Service over the next five to 10 years and this should enable action to be taken where appropriate to meet the requirements.

Earnings

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage of working men in Wales who earned less than £100 per week in the year 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Latest available data for Wales from the new earnings survey, April 1987 show that 6·4 per cent. of full-time male employees on adult rates (whose pay for the survey pay-period was not affected by absence) earned less than £100 per week.

Young Persons (Employment)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of young people left school in Wales and went directly into work at 16 years of age without training in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: This information is not available.

Sports Halls and Swimming Pools

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of local authority (i) sports halls and (ii) local authority swimming pools in each of the counties of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The number of local authority sports centres and swimming pools in each of the counties of Wales is as follows:

County	Sport centres	Swimming pools
Clwyd	15	17
Dyfed	10	17
Gwent	23	19
Gwynedd	7	9
Mid Glamorgan	17	18
Powys	8	8
South Glamorgan	11	8
West Glamorgan	6	7

Sports Council

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the cash grant in real terms to the Sports Council Wales in each of the years since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The grant-in-aid allocation to the Sports Council for Wales since 1979, adjusted by the gross domestic product (market prices) deflator at 1988-89 prices, is as follows:

1979-80	3,349,000
1980-81	3,519,000
1981-82	3,614,000
1982-83	3,769,000
1983-84	3,482,000
1984-85	3,430,000
1985-86	3,812,000
1986-87	4,135,000
1987-88	4,355,000
1988-89	4,199,000

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much capital spending has occurred under (i) Sports Council for Wales and (ii) local authorities Wales on sports facilities in each of the years since 1979: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Sports Council for Wales and local authorities' gross capital expenditure on sports facilities was as follows:

£ million

Year	Sports Council for Wales expenditure[1]	Local authorities expenditure[2]
1979-80	0·831	4·141
1980-81	0·966	9·849

Farm Inspectors

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many farm inspectors were employed by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in 1980 and 1986; what is the figure for the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Officers of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service visit farms for a variety of purposes, including the provision of technical advice to farmers at their request as well as for certain statutory purposes. There is no distinct category of ADAS farm inspector as such.

Rating Reform

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish his latest estimate of the number of people liable to pay the poll tax in (i) each of the counties of Wales, (ii) each of the districts and boroughs of Wales and (iii) each of the parliamentary constituencies of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Most adults in Wales will be liable to pay the community charge. At this stage, estimates of those exempt from the charge by county, district or parliamentary constituency are not available.

The estimated number of adults in each county and district in Wales is given in the following table.

Estimates of the number of adults in each parliamentary constituency in Wales are not available other than from the 1981 census.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide figures showing the numbers of housing applications and the numbers officially accepted as homeless in Wales for each year since 1978.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is given in the following table:

Number of cases accepted and presented 1978-87

Total	Cases presented	Cases accepted
[1]1978	5,042	3,204
1979	7,084	4,676
1980	8,277	5,446
1981	8,609	5,462

1986	9,861	5,965
1987	8,423	5,294

[1] Data for the first quarter of 1978 are not available. The monitoring of homelessness under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 did not commence in Wales until April 1978.

Welsh Language

Sir Anthony Meyer: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he has received from the working group he established to advise him on issues relating to the Welsh language: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have received valuable advice from the group and had a further useful discussion with it this week.

WDA (Regional Office)

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will arrange for further consultations with local authorities before the implementation of proposed changes in the Welsh Development Agency regional office boundaries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: [holding answer 13 July 1988]: I am assured that the agency will be willing to discuss any further representations made to it.

SCOTLAND

Green Belt

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by region and district the area of land designated as green belt up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Designated green belts in Scotland in 1986 (the latest available information) were as follows:

Region	Green belt	Hectares
Lothian	Lothian	14,600
Grampian	Aberdeen	82,355
Strathclyde/Central	Greater Glasgow	100,000
Strathclyde	Ayr/Prestwick	2,835
	TOTAL SCOTLAND	203,285
Total designated green belt in Scotland in 1979		218,470

Note: Between 1979 and 1986 the Dundee green belt (14,800 hectares) was de-designated and became the Dundee Countryside Policy Area. A breakdown of the 1979 figure is not available.

Areas of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, by region and district, the sites designated as of special scientific interest, and the area of each, up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is not available in the form requested. I shall however write to the hon. Member giving a list by region of all sites of special scientific interest at 31 December 1987. The list will show the area of each site and whether the site had been notified under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 by November 1981. I shall also send a list, by region, of sites of special scientific interest which had been notified by 30 November 1981, but which have subsequently been denotified. Copies of these lists will be placed in the Library of the House.

Crown Classification Scheme

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the results of any consumer research regarding public understanding of the crown classification schemes in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The Scottish tourist board has not to date undertaken any specific research into public awareness of the crown classification and grading scheme. I understand that the board plans to undertake research later this year by which time the public will have had reasonable experience of the scheme's operation.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department has assessed the sufficiency of local or regional monitoring of provision of services for mentally handicapped persons in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Home and Health Department has nearly completed the second round of monitoring health boards' implementation of the priorities for the Scottish Health Service set out in the report "Scottish Health Authorities Priorities for the Eighties" (SHAPE). That report recommended inter alia that high priority should be given to the provision of services for the mentally handicapped. Expenditure on those services rose by 6 per cent. in real terms from 1981-82 to 1986-87.

Mental Handicap Nurses

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in what way health boards' strategic plans embody a commitment to the continuation of mental handicap nurse training in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The strategic plans of Scottish health boards do not contain specific commitments to mental handicap nurse training. However, as part of the "Scottish Health Authorities Priorities for the Eighties" monitoring programme, plans include a nursing manpower analysis (including the mental handicap programme) for a projected period of 10 years. From this, health boards are able to determine their future staffing recruitment and training requirements. In addition the Scottish Home and Health Department has had discussions with health boards about target figures for recruitment to mental handicap nurse training programmes and these target figures will be kept under review. When health boards submit proposals for new capital developments such as new wards or units for the improvement of mental handicap service, the Scottish Home and Health Department has to be fully satisfied that appropriately trained nursing staff will be available to commission and operate the new facilities before approval will be given.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many community mental handicap nurses are employed by each health board in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not at present collected centrally. Arrangements are being made to do so as part of a more general development of manpower and personnel management information systems in health boards.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provisions regions are making, as services move out into the community, to continue their commitment to mental handicap nurse training in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The staff of regional authorities involved in dealing with the mentally handicapped are mostly social workers. Mental handicap nurse training is provided at health boards' colleges of nursing and midwifery: curricula and standards of training are laid down and monitored by the National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Scotland. The Scottish Home and Health Department and the social work services group of the Scottish Education Department are providing £200,000 to fund a three-year project to establish guidelines for shared training and work experience for nurses and social work staff working with mentally handicapped people. The Scottish Home and Health Department has also had discussions with health boards about target figures for recruitment to mental handicap nurse training programmes and these target figures will be kept under review.

Mental Handicap Training

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses have entered into mental handicap training for each of the past five years in each region in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not held centrally in the form requested. The information readily available relates to Scotland as a whole and is given in the table. I shall write further to the hon. Member when figures for each health board are available.

Entrants to mental handicap nursing training

	Number
1983-84	148
1984-85	192
1985-86	178
1986-87	155
1987-88	194

Teachers

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of vacancies for teachers in (i) mathematics, (ii) history, (iii) English, (iv) sciences and (v) physical education in (a) Scotland, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Glasgow, for each year since 1974.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on vacancies for teachers is not available. Information on excesses and deficits of secondary school teachers is collected, and is published in an annual statistical bulletin. The most recent bulletin in the series is No 3/C1/1988, a copy of which was sent to the hon. Member. A copy is also held in the House of Commons Library.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total pay bill for nurses in Scotland in 1987-88.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Provisionally £621·3 million, on the basis of health board accounts submitted but not yet audited. This figure includes the pay costs of nursing staff not directly involved with patient care at ward level.

Homelessness

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the estimated costs to public funds of (a) keeping homeless families in hotels and (b) building new council houses for those families.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide figures showing the numbers of housing applications and the numbers officially accepted as homeless in Scotland for each year since 1978.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is set out in the table.

Homelessness: Applicant Households, Scotland

Period of application year ending 31 March	Number of applications	Number assessed by local authorities as homeless
1979	16,035	7,493
1980	15,460	7,440
1981	14,868	7,025
1982	15,955	8,270
1983	16,539	8,664
1984	15,516	8,086

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give figures showing the total expenditure on local authority housebuilding for each year since 1979 in terms of (i) current prices, (ii) 1988 prices and (iii) share of gross domestic product.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is available only in terms of financial years and in that form is set out in the table. Figures for earlier years are not readily available on a consistent basis and the last year for which final figures are available is 1986-87.

Local Authority Expenditure on Housebuilding

1984-85	64	77	0·28
1985-86	62	70	0·25
1986-87	63	69	0·23

[1] Figures shown are based on housing capital returns submitted by local authorities.

[2] Based on gross domestic product at factor costs, a measure which excludes taxes on expenditure and the effect of subsidies, and taken from "Regional Accounts" prepared annually by Central Statistical Office.

Community Service Orders

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many community service orders have been made by Cumbernauld and Kilsyth district court in each of the last two years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None.

Nuclear Waste (Disposal)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in the course of his meeting on 14 June with Mr. Baker of UK Nirex Ltd., he was advised by Mr. Baker when Nirex expects to be in a position to recommend to the Government one or more sites worthy of further investigation to assess their suitability as nuclear waste disposal facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I understand that Nirex hopes to be in a position to report the outcome of its consultation exercise and to make recommendations by early next year.

Nirex

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in the course of his meeting with Mr. John Baker of UK Nirex Ltd. on 14 June, he was advised whether Nirex was conducting preliminary investigations in Scotland on (a) the land holdings of its partners (b) other publicly owned land and (c) privately owned land; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No physical investigations are taking place at any site in Scotland, but Nirex is understood to be continuing with desk studies of the suitability of various areas of land throughout the United Kingdom, in order to make recommendations to the Government in due course.

Ambulances

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure on the Scottish ambulance service for Scotland as a whole and for each health board area for each of the past five years at constant prices.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Scottish ambulance service operational areas do not coincide with health board boundaries and it is not possible to calculate expenditure for each health board area. The expenditure for the whole of Scotland over the past five years at constant 1986-87 prices calculated by applying the gross domestic product (market prices) deflator, is as follows:

Year	Expenditure £
1983-84	25,867,460
1984-85	25,747,847
1985-86	25,677,434
1986-87	28,011,143
[1]1987-88	30,372,439

[1] Provisional.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, how many one-man ambulances there are still operating in each health board area in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Single-manned ambulances are not a specific type of vehicle. Ambulances are crewed by one or two members of staff in the light of operational circumstances, particularly the mobility and physical condition of the expected patients. There are long-standing arrangements to reinforce a single crew member if necessary.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many ambulances there are per 1,000 of the population in (a) Scotland as a whole and (b) for each health board area; and what is the equivalent ratio for England and Wales.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In December 1987 (the latest figure available) the number of ambulances per 1,000 of population in Scotland was 0.17. The number in each health board area is not readily available, since Scottish ambulance service operational areas do not coincide with health board boundaries. The ambulance service in England and Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many civil servants were brought to Westminster from Scotland for the debate on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order on 11 July; and what was the cost to public funds.

Mr. Lang: Four, three of whom also had other unrelated business which required their presence in London. Total travel and associated costs are estimated at £850.

Wetlands

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement concerning the classification of further sites in Scotland as special protection areas, under article 4 of European Community directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds, and the listing of further sites in Scotland as wetlands of international importance, under the Ramsar convention on wetlands of international importance, especially as waterfowl habitat.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am pleased to announce that the Government have accepted the recommendation of the Nature Conservancy Council that the following sites of special scientific interest should be classified as special protection areas (SPA) under the directive and, except as indicated, listed as wetlands of international importance under the Ramsar convention.

Site of special scientific interest	International designation
Gruinart Flats, Islay	(SPA), Ramsar
Eilean Na Muice Duibhe (Duich Moss), Islay	(SPA), Ramsar
Bridgend Flats, Islay	(SPA), Ramsar
Laggan Peninsula, Islay	(SPA)
Gladhouse Reservoir, Midlothian	(SPA), Ramsar
Din Moss—Hoselaw Loch, Roxburgh	(SPA), Ramsar

Aero Technologies

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the implications for employment prospects and the local economy of the difficulties facing Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes; and if he will meet the directors to discuss the firm's problems.

Mr. Lang: I understand that the numbers involved at the company's plants in Cumbernauld and Glenrothes are fewer than 100. These losses have to be seen in the context of increases of 944 and 107 in net employment in each of these new towns respectively during 1987-88. My officials are always ready to meet representatives of companies in Scotland who consider that the schemes of assistance operated by my Departments are relevant to their circumstances.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much regional industrial grant Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes has received for its factories, plant or equipment; what steps have been taken to secure the plant and machinery against the possibility of removal; and what investigations are being carried out into its original application for grant assistance.

Mr. Lang: The amount of regional development grant paid to Allivane International Ltd., now known as Aero Technologies in respect of its activities at Cumbernauld was published in British Business on 4 September 1987. RDG is not available in Glenrothes new town, an intermediate area. The disposal of assets at Cumbernauld is a matter for the company. My Department is monitoring the situation to ensure full compliance with the conditions attached to the payment of grant.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Christmas Bonuses

96. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many £10 Christmas bonuses were paid to pensioners at Christmas 1987.

Mr. Scott: It is estimated that about 11·5 million payments were made to pensioners and other qualifying beneficiaries in December 1987. Figures will be available with the publication of the national insurance fund and appropriation accounts later this year.

Community Health Services

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of (a) the total budget and (b) the revenue budget per hospital and community health services was allocated to community health services in each regional health authority in England during 1986-87.

Mr. Newton: Percentage figures for each region, derived from expenditure information recorded in the 1986-87 annual accounts of regional and district health authorities in England, are shown in the table.

Expenditure on community health services (CHS)—Proportions of total hospital and community health services (HCHS) expenditure

Region	Proportion[1] of revenue and capital expenditure on CHS to total HCHS revenue and capital expenditure Per cent.	Proportion[2] of revenue expenditure on CHS to total HCHS revenue expenditure Per cent.
Northern	9·5	9·8
Yorkshire	9·1	9·6
Trent	10·5	11·1
East Anglian	9·8	10·0
North West Thames	10·1	10·5
North East Thames	8·6	8·8
South East Thames	10·5	10·5
South West Thames	9·7	10·0
Wessex	9·9	10·7
Oxford	11·0	11·6
South Western	10·5	10·7
West Midlands	10·5	10·9
Mersey	9·8	10·1
North Western	11·1	11·6

[1] The expenditure figures used for CHS (that is, from the annual accounts) cover main services expenditure but exclude elements of broadly related expenditure (for example, on projects jointly financed with local authorities).

[2] Expenditure on HCHS represents total expenditure by the health authorities (including that on ambulance, blood transfusion, mass radiography and other services).

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the average expenditure on community health services per head of the population aged under four years, five to 14 years, 15 to 64 years, 64 to 75 years and over 75 years for each regional health authority in England in 1986-87;

(2) what was the expenditure per head of the population aged under four years, five to 14 years, 15 to 64 years, and 75 years and over on community health services (a) in 1979-80, and (b) in 1986-87 at constant prices.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information is not available.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of (a) the total National Health Service budget and (b) the revenue budget for the hospital and community health services was allocated to the community health services for each year from 1979-80 to 1986-87.

Mr. Newton: The percentage allocation of gross current expenditure on community health services of (a) the total National Health Service budget and (b) the revenue budget for the hospital and community health services for the years 1979-80 to 1986-87 is shown in the table.

(Percentage) England

	(a)	(b)
1979-80	6·6	8·4
1980-81	6·3	8·7
1981-82	6·4	8·7
1982-83	6·4	8·9
1983-84	6·4	9·0
1984-85	6·5	9·4
1985-86	6·8	9·8
1986-87	7·1	10·2

Note: Figures relate to current gross expenditure.

Community Medical Staff

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of whole-time equivalent community medical staff employed in the National Health Service in (a) 1979-80 and (b) 1986-87.

Mr. Newton: The whole-time equivalent numbers of medical staff in the community health services in England were:

	whole-time equivalent
30 September 1979	2,057
30 September 1986	2,186

Chiropodists

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for each district health authority in England, the number of whole-time equivalent chiropodists per 1,000 of the population aged 65 years and over in (a) 1979-80 and (b) 1986-87.

Mr. Newton: It would not be meaningful to provide the ratios of staff to population in specific age groups as chiropodists provide care to patients of all ages.

Nurses

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services in what way regional health authority strategic plans embody a commitment to the continuation of mental handicap nurse training in England.

Mr. Newton: Regional health authority strategic plans set out authorities' long-term objectives. Progress toward these objectives, including the continued development of community and district-based services for mentally handicapped people, is monitored through the annual accountability review process and analysis of short-term programmes. These include discussion of regional plans for mental handicap nurse training, information on which is collected in the short-term programmes.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what provisions regions are making, as services move out into the community, to continue their commitment to mental handicap nurse training in England.

Mr. Newton: It is for regional and district health authorities to determine the patterns of provision for mental handicap nurse training in the light of their local needs and resources. Details of these training arrangements are not held centrally.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what discussions his Department has had with local authority social services departments regarding the employment of nurses with mental handicap training; and what guidelines have been issued to ensure that this kind of training plays an integral role in planning services.

Mr. Newton: It is for the local and health authorities co-ordinating their plans for the mental handicap services for which they have statutory responsibility to agree as necessary appropriate arrangements for the selection, employment and training of care staff. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 16 March at column *615*on advice on the developing role of mental handicap nurses in the chief nursing officer's letter of 18 December 1988 (CNO(85)5).

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services which schools of nurse training have closed in the past two years.

Mr. Newton: No schools of nursing in England have closed in the past two years.

Mentally Handicapped Persons

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has assessed the sufficiency of local or regional monitoring of the provision of services for mentally handicapped persons in England.

Mrs. Currie: The Department assesses the sufficiency of local and regional monitoring in a number of ways and I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 30 March 1988 at columns 547-48.

Orthotic Services

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the results of the National Health Service Management Consultancy Services study of orthotic services in the National Health Service.

Mrs. Currie: This report is in the process of being finalised by the study team. It is hoped to go out to consultation on the contents of the report by the autumn.

NHS Review

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the organisations which have been invited to make submissions to the Government's review of the National Health Service.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 17 March at column 677.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of what background research has been commissioned for the Government's review of the National Health Service.

Mr. Moore: The review is able to draw on the extensive range of background material that already exists, including some which has been stimulated by the announcement of the review itself.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the organisations which have made submissions to the Government's review of the National Health Service.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Members for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg), for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams), for Redcar (Miss Mowlam) and for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) on 12 July at columns 152-53.

OPCS Office (Asbestos)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if it is safe for the staff and public to use the office of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys at St. Catherine's House; and whether he proposes to take any action regarding the asbestos there.

Mrs. Currie: Following recent building work in St. Catherine's house traces of asbestos fibres have been identified in a small number of rooms where certain parts of the internal fabric of the building had been damaged.

A programme of testing all such rooms has been undertaken as a matter of urgency and, when tests have proved positive, rooms have been closed to staff, cleaned by a specialist company and not reopened until further tests have proved negative. No traces of asbestos fibres have been found in those rooms to which the public have free access.

The Property Services Agency is being consulted on the prevention of any recurrence of this problem in future.

Rating Reform

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if there will be deductions from income support for claimants who do not pay their community charge.

Mr. Portillo: Paragraph 6 of schedule 4 to the Local Government Finance Bill (as amended on Report) provides for regulations which will enable deductions to be made from income support if a magistrates court has issued a liability order for community charge payments in England and Wales. Schedule 12 makes parallel provision for Scotland.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if the name and address of persons who claim income support but not a community charge rebate will be given to the local community charge registration officer.

Mr. Portillo: No. The names and addresses of those who are awarded income support but who do not claim a community charge rebate will be given to the community charge registration officer.

Departmental Forms

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much it has cost his Department in photocopying and duplicating costs since form A14BL has been out of print.

Mr. Portillo: Form A14BL went out of stock on 2 March 1988. Reprint and subsequent distribution was completed by 13 July 1988. While out of stock, the total additional cost of printing and photocopying for regional and local offices was approximately £4,300.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of printing form MF36A print run April 1988; and how much it cost to correct.

Mr. Portillo: The April 1988 costs of printing form MF36A were £2,340·43. It contained a very obvious single-word printing error which is being put right clerically in local offices at minimal cost.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many new forms were created as a result of the Social Security Act 1986; how many were abolished; and how many had to be amended.

Mr. Portillo: The reforms introduced in April 1988, as a result of the Social Security Act 1986, required the introduction of 100 new forms for use by local offices including four transitional forms. Some 296 other forms used by local offices were amended and 131 existing forms were abolished. Information on forms introduced, amended, or abolished earlier than April 1986, as a result of the Social Security Act 1986, could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Department Offices

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what offices of his Department have become vacant as a result of the move to Richmond house.

Mr. Moore: The move of some 480 staff to Richmond house has left space in Alexander Fleming house, Friars house and Hannibal house.

In order to provide decant space for the planned refurbishment of Alexander Fleming house, a rationalisation programme has begun in these buildings. The space gained from the move to Whitehall will therefore be used initially for decant space and eventually released from the estate following implementation of our accommodation strategy on the completion of the refurbishment of Alexander Fleming house in 1992-93.

Resettlement Unit (Southampton)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are his plans for his Department's Southampton resettlement unit, Mill Brook road, over the next five years.

Mr. Portillo: In 1985 we announced that we intended to work towards the closure of all resettlement units, replacing them with other facilities, to be run by voluntary oranisations and local authorities but funded by the Government. Proposals for the provision of facilities in the Southampton area were agreed with the local review team earlier this year. The unit will be run down as those facilities become available and will close as soon as an agreed number of replacement bed spaces have been provided. I anticipate that closure will take place within the next five years.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of the refurbishment of his Department's Southampton resettlement unit at Mill Brook road.

Mr. Portillo: No general refurbishment of the Southampton resettlement unit has taken place. Essential plumbing repairs are currently in progress at an estimated cost of £33,000.

Staff Retraining

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the breakdown costs of retraining staff at national and local level, including all training materials, to enable them to adminster the new social security system following the implementation of the Social Security Act 1986.

Mr. Portillo: The breakdown is as follows:

Local office staff	= 2,214 man years	= £19·9 million
Regional office staff	= 6 man years	= £100,000
Central office staff	= 53 man years	= £0·5 million
Central training staff	= 51 man years	= £0·5 million

In addition, printing costs for the training material totalled approximately £0·5 million (£447,871).

Disabled Persons

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of alleged discrimination against disabled people have been made to him during each of the years 1982 to 1988 inclusive; and if he will outline what action was taken in each case.

Mr. Scott: Since 1983, 34 cases of alleged discrimination against disabled people have been referred to the Department following the invitation by the then Minister for the disabled, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H.Rossi). The number received each year is as follows:

	Cases
1983	22
1984	3
1985	2
1986	none
1987	4
[1]1988	3

[1] First 6 months.

For those cases where investigations have been completed:

In 10 cases no evidence of discrimination was found.

In six cases, insufficient information was available to enable enquiries to be completed.

In four cases there were genuine problems of access.

Three cases involved judgments by a particular employer that the individual's disability adversely affected their ability to perform the job efficiently or safely.

In three cases the problem was resolved in favour of the complainant during the course of our enquiries.

Two cases involved commercial judgments, the basis of which could not effectively be checked.

One case concerned maritime regulations laid before Parliament.

One case was a complaint by a disabled person against an employee who was subsequently disciplined by the employer.

One case involved a conflict of opinion over the application of 'right to buy' housing legislation.

In one case the Department requested further information from the complainant but received no response.

In one case the complainant was seeking the introduction of anti-discrimination legislation and we responded by setting out our position on this issue.

There is currently one case still under consideration.

Organ Donors

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the names of those holding organ donor cards are entered on a centralised computer.

Mrs. Currie: The national donor card scheme is not related to computerised registers of potential organ donors. The intention of the donor card was described in my reply to my hon. Friend on 4 May at column 504. At present we have no plans to establish a national register of potential donors. We wish to see an evaluation of the registers being established by the Manpower Services Commission, for example, in Birmingham and Sheffield, and of a similar scheme operating in Wales before giving further consideration to this question.

Ambulances

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many one-man ambulances there are still operating in England and Wales as a whole and for each health authority area.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that the information requested is not available centrally.

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the number of (a) claimants and (b) dependants claiming each of the means-tested benefits for which he is responsible.

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the reply to the then hon. Member for Kensington, 14 April 1986, Official Report, columns 271-72, estimating the total number of (a) families and (b) persons in the United Kingdom receiving income-related benefits; and if he will also estimate the number of families and persons who were entitled but not claiming.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 11 July 1988]: This information requested is set out as follows:

Income-related benefit recipients and their dependants
Great Britain—latest available figures

(Thousands)

Date and benefit	Number of recipients	Number of dependants
May 1987
Supplementary benefit	4,896	3,309
March 1988
Family income supplement	[1]210	[1]570
Autumn 1986
Standard HB	3,730	n/a
Recipients getting one or more income-related benefit	[2]8,400	n/a n/a—Figures not available.

[1] Cases considered at time of conversion to family credit. The number of dependants is estimated from earlier figures.

[2] This figure reflects an adjustment for the overlap between the benefits (ie people receiving two or more of the above benefits).

Primary Care Psychiatry

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are his Department's plans for the future funding of research into primary care psychiatry; what arrangements have been made with the Medical Research Council for work to continue in this area; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 11 July 1988]: We continue to regard research into primary care psychiatry as important. In view of the forthcoming retirement of the director of the DHSS-funded general practice research unit at the Institute of Psychiatry we have, as is our normal practice, reviewed the way we support work in this area. The Medical Research Council has also reviewed its future arrangements for research in this area, given the forthcoming retirement of the directors of its two existing units of social psychiatry. As a result, the MRC is establishing a new unit of social psychiatry, and we intend to fund a significant programme of research based at the new unit. I hope that these collaborative arrangements with the MRC will support research of high scientific quality with benefits for patients and those who care for them.

ENERGY

Piper Alpha

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his statement of 7 July, Official Report, columns 1191-98, whether the public inquiry he announced on the Piper Alpha platform disaster will review safety procedures for work in the North sea generally; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: Since my statement to the House on 7 July, I have had the opportunity to consult the Attorney-General and the Lord Advocate on the form of the public inquiry.

The public inquiry will take place under the Offshore Installations (Public Inquiries) Regulations 1974. These regulations were made under the Mineral Workings (Offshore Installations) Act 1971 and were expressly designed to provide for public inquiries into casualties and accidents involving offshore installations. They provide full powers for appointing assessors, summoning witnesses, collecting evidence and making recommendations.

I have appointed Lord Cullen, a senator of the College of Justice in Scotland as the chairman of the public inquiry. The Government intend that the public inquiry will be as full and far reaching as necessary. I have arranged for copies of the instrument directing that a public inquiry be held to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses and in the Vote Office. It provides that the inquiry be held to establish the circumstances of the accident and its cause. It also appoints Lord Cullen to hold the inquiry and to report to me on the circumstances of the accident and its cause together with any observations and recommendations which he thinks fit to make with a view to the preservation of life and the avoidance of similar accidents in the future.

The inquiry will be held in Aberdeen. The Lord Advocate has indicated that the Scottish Law Officers will represent the public interest in the inquiry.

I am also very anxious that if there are any early lessons that can be learnt from the disaster we should extract them and issue immediate guidance to operators of North sea installations. The Health and Safety Commission and I have therefore agreed that a speedy and thorough technical investigation will be held under section 14(2)(a) of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and under regulations made under the Mineral Workings (Offshore Installations) Act 1971 to establish the cause of the accident.

The person appointed by the Health and Safety Commission and myself under these provisions is Mr. J. R. Petrie, the director of safety in the petroleum engineering division of my Department who is working in close consultation with the staff of the Health and Safety Executive and with the procurator fiscal. He will make a report to both the commission and myself as quickly as possible and we will then consider whether and, if so, what guidance should be issued. The report of this investigation will be available as evidence to the public inquiry which will be free to question or supplement it as it wishes.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now make public the inquiry report into the explosion on the Piper Alpha platform in 1984.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall make the report of the investigation of the 1984 explosion available to the forthcoming public inquiry into the Piper Alpha accident.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when an inspector from his Department last inspected modules on the Piper Alpha platform for the fire test; and what action was said to be necessary in order that the appropriate safety standard would be reached.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The inspection of modules on the platform for structural fire safety is a matter for the certifying authority. The second annual survey within the five-year cycle of the current certificate of fitness from the certifying authority took place between January and April of this year. The fire-fighting equipment in place on the platform is examined every two years by the Department of Transport to ensure its effectiveness. The last Department of Transport survey was completed in February of this year. A satisfactory survey report was issued shortly thereafter.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will supply copies of his Department's report into the fire and explosion on the Piper Alpha oil rig in 1984 (a) to the chair of the public inquiry into the explosion and (b) to the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already announced, I shall make available to the public inquiry all the relevant information held by my Department, including the results of the investigation into the 1984 explosion on Piper Alpha. It will then be for the public inquiry to decide whether and how to publish this information.

North Sea Installations

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many persons were killed in the course of their employment on oil platforms and similar installations in the North sea in the last 10 years for which information is available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Accident statistics of the kind requested by the hon. and learned Member are published in the annual report to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Energy on the development of the oil and gas resources of the United Kingdom, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. The latest statistics show that there were 76 fatal accidents in the years 1978 to 1987.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many serious accidents have occurred on gas or oil installations each year since 1965; how many of these each year involved fatalities; how many persons were killed each year; and how many persons in total have been killed in such accidents since 1965.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Accident statistics of the kind requested by the hon. Member are published in the annual report to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Energy on the development of the oil and gas resources of the United Kingdom, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the agencies which carry out inspections of oil and gas installations in the North sea; and how many inspectors each of these agencies had engaged on this work each year since 1965.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The independent agencies for offshore installations appointed by the Government are the following six certifying authorities:

Lloyd's Register of Shipping, American Bureau of Shipping, Bureau Veritas, Det Norske Veritas, Germanischer Lloyd and the Offshore Certification Bureau.

The staff numbers employed by the certifying authorities are a matter for them. My own Department and the Department of Transport also carry out safety inspections.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list each occasion and date since 1965 when safety inspectors of oil and gas installations in the North sea have recommended or required significant changes, other than minor matters, to be carried out as a result of inspections; which owners were involved; what action was taken to ensure whether such recommendations or required actions were actually carried out; and in which cases such actions had not been carried out by the time of the next inspection.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available in the form requested. However, generally speaking the Department carries out over 200 inspections and between 25 and 30 accident investigations each year. In the majority of cases inspections result in recommendations for action, usually of a minor nature, to be taken. Progress on carrying out recommendations is continuously monitored by the Department.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list all the occasions and dates since 1965 when the owners of gas or oil rig installations in the North sea have been prosecuted; what was the basis of the prosecution in each case; and what was the penalty imposed on each occasion when an offence was proved.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Details are available only from 1977. Since then 65 prosecutions of companies or persons have been brought in connection with offshore safety requirements monitored by my Department. The basis of prosecution in each case was infringement of the requirements under the legislation applying to operations on the United Kingdom continental shelf. The penalties are imposed in accordance with the penalty provisions set out in the appropriate legislation.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list, for each of the gas and oil rig installations in the North sea, the date of each safety inspection carried out in the last five years, which agency carried out the inspection, the length each inspection lasted, how many persons carried out each inspection and the conclusion of the inspection in each case.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The figures are not available in the form requested. In broad terms the Department's safety inspectorate carries out over 200 inspections annually. Each inspection usually lasts between one and two days and is carried out by a single inspector. The frequency of inspection varies depending on the circumstances of the individual installation, but in general an inspector would visit each installation at least once a year. Any lessons from the inspections are notified by means of a letter to the offshore installation manager and to his company management, and by the issue of safety notices, which are circulated to all offshore operators and throughout the industry.

The Department of Transport surveys all offshore installations every two years to ensure that the fire-fighting equipment and life-saving appliances meet the necessary requirements. No Department of Transport surveyors are allocated exclusively to the survey of offshore installations and so there are no figures for the actual number of inspectors engaged in the work, but it is estimated that around 12 to 15 man years per annum are devoted to this work.

The certifying authorities make an independent assessment of the design and construction of every offshore installation. Major surveys of offshore installations are carried out before the first certificate of fitness is issued and every five years thereafter. In addition, every year there is an annual survey carried out so that the certifying authority may satisfy itself that the installation remains fit for its purpose. The certifying authorities employ surveyors of many disciplines and they estimate that in aggregate 250 man years each year are devoted to offshore installations.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list each serious accident that has occurred regarding oil and gas exploration and drilling in the North sea since 1980; what was the cause and nature of the accident; in each case, how many persons were killed and injured in each accident; in which cases an inquiry was carried out into each episode; and whether the inquiry was made public.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Accident statistics of the kind requested by the hon. Member are published in the annual report to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Energy on the development of the oil and gas resources of the United Kingdom, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. An investigation is carried out by the Department of Energy inspectorate into all the serious accidents, and any lessons to be learnt are made available publicly by way of regular safety notices issued by the safety directorate of my petroleum engineering division.

Electricity

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy by what percentage electricity charges have risen since May 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Over the period June 1979 to May 1988, electricity charges to domestic consumers rose in real terms by 2·5 per cent. and those to industrial consumers fell by 3 per cent.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Education Standards

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he will take to ensure comparable education standards between maintained and Government schools.

Dr. Mawhinney: Controlled and maintained schools are treated on a similar basis and this will continue to apply to the range of current and future initiatives aimed at improving standards.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the future generation of electricity in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Viggers: In 1985 the Government identified the need for new generating capacity to be available in Northern Ireland from the mid-1990s. Tenders were invited from NIE and the private sector to find the most cost-effective way of meeting this requirement, taking account of the availability of indigenous lignite deposits.

The main options were a public or private sector lignite-fired station or the installation of generating sets 3 and 4 at the Kilroot power station (known as Kilroot phase II) as dual coal/oil-fired units.

In the event, the particular circumstances of the availability of spare plant already purchased but not yet installed, together with the lower levels of coal and oil prices that are now forecast, made the option of proceeding with Kilroot II the most economical outcome.

The Government have therefore decided that the requirement for new generating capacity in Northern Ireland will be met by Kilroot phase II.

There is strong evidence, however, that had the particular circumstance of the lower capital cost not existed, a lignite station would otherwise have had significant advantages and therefore the next power station in Northern Ireland is likely to be lignite-fired.

This view is reinforced by the positive approach evident in the proposals submitted by the private sector for a lignite-fired power station, and in particular in that from the Antrim Power Company Limited, which emerged as much the strongest private sector group.

The Government are determined that the benefits from private sector involvement in the electricity supply industry should be available to Northern Ireland consumers as they will be to those in the rest of the United Kingdom. They therefore propose to set in hand immediately consideration of ways of privatising the Northern Ireland electricity system.

In the appraisal of these options the Government have been advised by Coopers and Lybrand Associates Limited (with Ewbank Preece Power and Water Limited) on economic and technical issues, N. M. Rothschild and Son Limited on financial matters, Denton Hall Burgin and Warrens, solicitors, on legal and contractural matters, and Dr. Otto Gold GMBH on lignite mining.

Security Forces (Offences)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will publish in the Official Report a list of those cases where members of security forces have been charged with offences causing (a) the death of or (b) injury to civilians for each year since 1969, indicating the branch of the service involved, such as Royal Ulster Constabulary, the Ulster Defence Regiment, the Army, the Royal Marines, and so on, the charge originally brought, the charge for which each person was tried, the verdict and, where appropriate, where the sentence was or is being served.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 30 June 1988]: I will write to the hon. Member.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Religious Education

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning maintaining the provision of religious education in state schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: A large number of letters have been received about the place of religious education in the curriculum of maintained schools. The Government believe that the concerns expressed have been met by the provisions now contained in the Education Reform Bill.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to provide additional resources to assist local education authorities to fulfil their duty to provide further education with regard to the needs of persons with special educational needs.

Mr. Dunn: No. The Education Reform Bill, as amended, makes explicit, but does not extend, the responsibility of local education authorities to have regard to special educational needs in securing the provision of adequate facilities for further education. It will continue to be for local education authorities to decide their own spending priorities within existing planned provision.

Gloucestershire College of Arts and Technology

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will be in a position to announce his decision regarding the future of the Gloucestershire College of Arts and Technology, Gloucester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The applications from Gloucestershire College of Arts and Technology and a number of other colleges to join the new Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council sector raise very important issues both for the colleges concerned and for the future patterns of higher and further education provision nationally. My right hon.

Friend is accordingly giving the applications careful consideration. He hopes to be able to make an announcement shortly.

School Buildings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of investment in new school buildings and the repair of existing school buildings in Cornwall.

Mr. Dunn: In 1988-89 the schools element of the Cornwall authority's prescribed allocation for capital expenditure on county and voluntary controlled schools was £6·274 million. This allocation, which covered 78 per cent. of the authority's submitted plans, reflects the Government's awareness and appreciation of the authority's problems. In addition, Cornwall was allocated £145,000 in respect of work at voluntary aided schools.

Public Expenditure Survey

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide a detailed breakdown for the years 1982-83 to 1990-91, by nature of item and functional area of charge, of the receipts to his programme classified as charges for the purposes of the public expenditure survey.

Mrs. Rumbold [holding answer 7 July 1988]: The figures in the table relate to receipts in respect of programme expenditure; receipts in respect of running costs expenditure are not included. They do not take into account the changes in funding responsibility, for example, in the case of polytechnics, which will take place after the Education Reform Bill is enacted.

Fee income; examination fees; research and consultancy income; rents and charges; and grants.

Miscellaneous
Income of youth and other educational services; other fees and charges.

Research Councils
Charges for commissioned research.

PRIME MINISTER

Global Atmosphere

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she proposes to support the five-point plan to protect the global atmosphere, set out in the address by the Norwegian Prime Minister before the world conference on the changing atmosphere: implications for global security.

The Prime Minister: I welcome Mrs. Brundtland's contribution, delivered to the Toronto conference. Several of her points were also stressed by my noble Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water in a written message to the conference, in particular the need for international co-operation in seeking solutions to the problems posed by climate change, in developing renewable energy resources and co-ordinating scientific research. The special problems of the poorest countries, stressed by Mrs. Brundtland, have already been recognised by the agreement we reached on debt relief at the Toronto economic summit. For the moment, however, it would be premature to place high priority on the proposal to establish a global convention on protection of the climate. The best immediate use of our resources lies in the difficult task of reducing uncertainty about the nature and consequences of atmospheric change.

Nuclear Submarines (Canada)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if, during her recent visit to Toronto, she discussed with the Canadian Prime Minister the sale of nuclear submarines to Canada.

The Prime Minister: Yes. As has been widely reported, the subject was discussed during my recent visit to Canada.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her meeting with Canadian Government Ministers in Ottawa on 22 June concerning the sale of British Trafalgar Class nuclear submarines to Canada.

The Prime Minister: No.

Plutonium Exports (Japan)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if, during her recent visit to Toronto, for the meeting of leading industrial nations, she discussed with the Japanese Prime Minister the matter of commercial exports of plutonium from the United Kingdom to Japan with respect to economic benefits and safety.

The Prime Minister: No.

French Nuclear Energy Programme

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if, during her recent visit to Toronto for the economic summit, she discussed the French nuclear energy programme with the President of France.

The Prime Minister: No.

Radioactive Fallout (Turkey)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Prime Minister if, during her visit to Turkey in April, she had the opportunity to raise with the Turkish Government the matter of the economic effects on Turkish farmers of the Chernobyl radioactive fallout.

The Prime Minister: This subject was not raised during my visit to Turkey.

Cuba (Performing Musicians)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Prime Minister which Government Department or Departments are involved in agreeing (a) work permits and (b) visa applications for performing musicians from Cuba.

The Prime Minister: Work permits are a matter for the Department of Employment. Visa applications are dealt with by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Home Office.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Capital Controls

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what capital controls other European Economic Community countries operate.

Mr. Lilley: The United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Netherlands all have full freedom of capital movements, while Belgium and Luxembourg have no controls apart from those needed to maintain a dual exchange rate system, under which they have an "official" foreign exchange market for current account transactions, and a "free" one for capital transactions. Only authorised banks may carry out exchange transactions permitted in the "official" market, although they may sell on the official market currencies acquired on the free market. French residents are still not generally permitted to hold bank accounts abroad or open foreign currency accounts in France and there are restrictions on the amounts that banks can lend to non-residents. Denmark retains some restrictions, for example, on the maturity of foreign loans taken up by non-financial enterprises, on financial credits and loans between residents and non-residents, on residents holding foreign bank deposits and on the size of non-residents' krone deposits in Danish banks. The Italians have committed themselves to liberalisation of all remaining restrictions in October 1988, except on residents' holdings of lire or foreign currency deposits abroad, the opening of lire or foreign currency lines of credit in favour of foreign countries and foreign exchange forward or option transactions with foreign counterparties. Ireland, Greece, Portugal and Spain maintain more extensive systems of exchange control covering, in particular, those areas such as short-term capital movements, the issuing of unlisted securities and non-commercial loans, where, until now, there has been no binding obligation to liberalise. Adoption of the European Community's capital liberalisation directive on 24 June extends liberalisation to all capital movements within the Community, in most cases by 1 July 1990 but with extensions for Spain, Ireland, Greece and Portugal.

Small and Medium-size Enterprises

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the 1986 European Community draft directive for small and medium-size enterprises to be implemented.

Mr. Lilley: The President of the European Council has given no indication of the future timetable for consideration of this draft directive.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether new office building contracts entered into and completed before 1 April 1989 will be exempt from value added tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: In my statement of 21 June I made it clear that there would be no changes to the current value added tax arrangements before 1 April 1989. It follows that a contract for a completely new office building entered into and completed before that date will remain zero rated.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what announcements he has made concerning the receipt of comments by Her Majesty's Government relating to the mode and timing of incorporation of the recent ruling of the Court of the European Communities on value added tax; and if he will give the body or person and the address to which comments should be sent.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 July 1988]: As I informed the House on 21 June, at columns 957-58, no changes to the VAT law to give effect to the judgment will take effect before 1 April 1989. A consultation document on issues affecting non-domestic construction was made available in the Vote Office and the Library on that day. A consultation paper on other aspects of the judgment was announced and placed in the Library on 30 June, as announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood), at column 331.

Copies of both documents are available from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, New King's Beam House, 22 Upper Ground, London SE1 9PJ. Any person or body wishing to comment on these proposals should write to VAT Administration Directorate, Division F, Room 14 at the above address no later than 31 August, although consultation with those who comment by 31 August will continue after that date.

European Economies

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the 10 fastest growing economies in Europe in descending order and with their corresponding percentages of growth for each year since 1979.

Mr. Major [holding answer 14 July 1988]: Information on the growth rates of Western European countries for the years in question can be found in the June 1988 OECD Economic Outlook, table R1.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will take steps to encourage Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to reduce its demand for on-board customs and immigration facilities on Channel tunnel through trains due to serve places including Birmingham International and Birmingham New Street to a level more in line with the half-coach requirement of European operators of trans-national services.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 11 July 1988]: Customs and Excise has asked for only 20 sq m of accommodation on the through services to points beyond London.

Coral

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many consignments of coral have been impounded by customs officials since the coming into operation of appendix II of the conference on international trade in endangered species 1985.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 8 July 1988]: Latest available records show that Customs has made eight seizures of coral sine 29 August 1985, when EC regulation No. 2384/5 came into force.

DEFENCE

DROPS

Sir Ian Gilmore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when was the last occasion on which a DROPS medium mobility vehicle overturned; what injuries were caused; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: One of the DROPS medium mobility vehicles currently undergoing pre-production validation trials was involved in a minor incident on 17 June in which it fell on its side when negotiating a bend on the RARDE rough road test track. The military crew of the vehicle suffered cuts and abrasions which required out-patient hospital treatment.

WALES

Cwm Dyli Power Station

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received about a proposal to put an underground pipeline from Cwm Dyli power station in the event of its reopening; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I have received a number of representations, from the Snowdonia National Park Society and others, objecting to the CEGB's replacement plans for the supply pipelines to its Cwm Dyli hydro-electric station.

The CEGB and the local planning authority take the view that replacement is "permitted development" under the terms of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on research into the feasibility of laying an underground pipeline to serve Cwm Dyli power station.

Mr. Grist: I am not aware of any such research.

Land Development, Ewloe

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet councillors and representatives of residents in Ewloe concerning their objections to the Redrow development Ewloe, Deeside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: No. Redrow Commercial Developments Ltd. has appealed to my right hon. Friend following the failure of Alyn and Deeside district council to determine within the prescribed period its application for planning permission for development of land at Ewloe, Clwyd. Arrangements are being made for a public inquiry to be held into the appeal and, in view of this, it would not be appropriate for my right hon. Friend to meet local representatives to discuss the proposed development.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many community mental handicap nurses are employed by each health authority in Wales.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 14 July 1988]: Information, taken primarily from the NHS payroll, does not at present permit reliable estimates to be made of numbers of community mental handicap nurses. However, work is being carried out by the district health authorities in conjunction with Welsh Office officials to enable such information to be extracted in the longer term.

Speech Therapists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make available extra cash to local authorities to enable them to provide courses locally for the training of speech therapists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 14 July 1988]: Funding for speech therapist courses in local authority maintained institutes is provided through the AFE pool. At present a four-year honours degree course for speech therapists is provided at South Glamorgan Institute of Higher Education, which recruits students from all parts of Wales. The initiative for proposing new higher education courses rests with the colleges and their maintaining authorities. Proposals for new courses are considered by the Wales Advisory Body and, if approved, would need to be funded from the AFE pool.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Overseas Trade Board

Mr. Crowther: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the levels of funding of the British Overseas Trade Board for 1988-89 and the last five financial years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The British Overseas Trade Board guides and directs my Department's export promotion effort. The amounts of expenditure in each of the past five years and planned for the current year are as follows:

£ millions

	Gross expenditure	Net expenditure
1983-84	29·8	22·2
1984-85[1]	37·4	28·5
1985-86[2]	39·1	27·7
1986-87	40·0	25·3
1987-88[3]	40·2	25·2
1988-89[4]	44·4	27·2

[1] Includes expenditure on publicity and promotion previously shown as expenditure of the Central Office of Information. The expenditure amounted to £2·1 million.
[2] Includes revenue from the operation of the export intelligence service previously treated as computer services receipts. Receipts amounted to £0·5 million.
[3] The outturn for 1987-88 is provisional. Includes expenditure of £0·4 million on publications for the statistics and market intelligence library previously treated as part of general expenditure on libraries.
[4] Includes the grant-in-aid to the International Customs Tariff Bureau of £0·38 million. Includes £0·4 million for the second half of the year on the "New Products from Britain" service previously borne by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Recycling Advisory Unit

Mr. Crowther: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the future role of the recycling advisory unit at Warren Spring laboratory in relation to the reclamation and recycling industries.

Mr. Butcher: The future role of the recycling advisory unit will be largely unchanged.

European Community (Joint Research Centres)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any plans to make additional funds available to assist new initiatives at the European Economic Community joint research centres at Geel in Belgium, Petten in the Netherlands, Karlsruhe in the Federal Republic of Germany and Ispra in Italy.

Mr. Butcher: A 1988-91 programme for the Joint Research Centre was agreed at the Research Council on 29 June. This provides 700 million ecu (£466 million) of Community funding for specific research programmes at the Joint Research Centre, and sets targets for a further 250 million ecu (£166 million) of work under contract to Commission directorates and external customers, both private and public. I regard this as a satisfactory settlement. The obligation on the Joint Research Centre to increase its earnings under contractual arrangements is part of a package of measures aimed to make the Joint Research Centre more efficient and its work more relevant to the Community's needs.

United Kingdom Government Departments will be willing to consider contracting some of their research needs to the Joint Research Centre if they are persuaded that the appropriate expertise is available there at a competitive price.

Northern Region

Mr. Cousin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the Government's achievements for the northern region on a basis comparable with the answer of the Secretary of State for Wales to the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on 21 June, Official Report, columns 498-504.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 11 July 1988]: I have outlined as follows the activities and achievements relevant to the work of the Department of Trade and Industry along with those appropriate to my wider inner cities brief.

Seasonally adjusted unemployment in the north has fallen by 31,500 over the past 12 months and now stands at its lowest level since April 1981. The total of unemployed school leavers is down by 24 per cent. over the past year. Vacancies continue to rise, while redundancies were 44 per cent. less in 1987 than in the previous year. The CBI and chambers of commerce report good progress in the regional economy in a wide range of industries, with output, sales and investment all buoyant and auguring well for further progress in the future. The number of employees in employment has risen by 13,000 in 1987 and by almost 50,000 since 1983. Similarly, self-employment in the region has increased by 400,000 since 1979, representing more than 40 per cent. of the nationwide increase in self-employment.

In the past year the north has attracted eight new inward investment projects from four countries. These projects involve fixed investment of £14 million and the creation of 1,173 jobs over three years. A further 11 overseas companies announced expansion plans in the region with investments totalling £327 million and creating 1,700 jobs as well as safeguarding a further 1,500 jobs over the next three years. Interest in the region from overseas continues to show a dramatic increase, with inquiries in the year to June 1988 totalling 284, an increase of 83 per cent. on the previous year.

The Northern Development Company was allocated a total of £1·165 million for 1988-89 for its inward investment promotional programme and for wider activities in support of the region's small business sector and wider regional regeneration. This is an increase of £47,000 on the previous year, with the NDC receiving over 40 per cent. of the total DTI support for English regional development organisations.

In 1987-88, English Estates North completed over 659,000 sq ft of industrial work space at a cost of £19 million and let almost 1,500,000 sq ft of space.

Companies are registering for VAT at a rate of around 6,000 a year, comfortably exceeding deregistrations, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment informs me that the small firms centre in Newcastle dealt with nearly 9,800 inquiries in the six months to 30 June 1988, an increase of 11 per cent. on the previous six months.

Since June 1987 a total of over 5,500 applications for regional development grant have been received. There have been 329 applications for regional selective assistance during the same period, 34 per cent. higher than the previous year. If the potential of the projects associated with these applications is fully realised, it will increase investment in the north by over £2,000 million and create over 65,000 jobs in the next few years.

Since the launch of the new enterprise initiative in January of this year the DTI has received 430 applications for consultancy assistance from the northern region, and since the launch of the regional enterprise grants in April over 500 inquiries have been received. Marketing of the new initiatives in the region to maximise take-up continues at high levels, and since January the DTI has participated in over 130 events, making direct contact with almost 4,000 representatives of local firms.

In the year to 30 June 1988 the DTI held 933 meetings with companies regarding export problems and participated in 39 seminars/workshops, which were attended by 578 companies. The Department arranged visits to the region for 69 commercial officers from posts worldwide, who were seen by 427 northern companies. The DTI also sponsored eight overseas trade missions organised by the Northern Development Company. As a result of this promotional activity, which continues at high levels, the Department found 177 potential or actual new exporters and attracted 43 companies to subscribe to the export intelligence service.

An application for an integrated development operations programme for the years 1989 to 1994 was submitted to the European Commission in May of this year on behalf of the counties of Cleveland and Durham. It is presently being considered by the Commission, and the Government are seeking speedy approval of the application. An application for an IDOP is being prepared for Tyne and Wear and south-east Northumberland. It is hoped that a formal submission to the Commission can be made shortly.

IDOP status will enable programme areas to obtain maximum and priority assistance under the various Community structural instruments (including the European regional development fund and European social fund). This will greatly assist progress towards economic regeneration in these areas in coordination with United Kingdom measures of regional industrial assistance, spending on infrastructure, and Training Commission schemes.

A great deal of redevelopment activity is taking place in inner areas in the region. The Tyne and Wear city action team and the Cleveland co-ordinating team are effectively co-ordinating Government spending of over £80 million a year in the inner areas, while at the same time supporting nearly 50 initiatives from their special funds: £3 million spent so far out of the funds has triggered a total spend of £12 million. My task forces in Middlesbrough and Hartlepool have supported over 70 projects to the tune of £2,500,000, which has helped to trigger a further £9 million of supporting funds. But significantly we are seeing, in the northern inner areas, a revival of private sector-led regeneration. This was exemplified by the excellent response to the action for cities presentation held in Newcastle earlier this year. Another example is the Newcastle initiative, announced last month and involving a number of exciting and forward-looking projects for the regional capital. This initiative, led by the private sector., has received, and will continue to receive, the full support of the Government.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Guatemala and Belize

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress had been made towards a peace settlement by the recently established joint commission of Guatemala and Belize.

Mr. Eggar: A second round of talks of the Belize/Guatemala joint commission was held on 12-13 July. At the invitation of both sides the United Kingdom attended as an additional participant.

United States (Visas)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many United Kingdom citizens have been refused boarding passes by foreign airlines flying from the United Kingdom to the United States of America because they were unaware of the relaxation of the United States visa requirements.

Mr. Eggar: We are not monitoring the operation of the United States visa-waiver scheme directly, but I understand it is operating smoothly. There have been no reports that eligible travellers have been refused boarding passes.

Libya

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress Her Majesty's Government are making in establishing normal relations with Libya.

Mr. Eggar: There can be no question of returning to normal relations with the Libyan Government as long as they maintain their support for international terrorism, including the IRA.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British subjects are currently working in Libya.

Mr. Eggar: We do not have separate figures for those British nationals currently working in Libya, but the approximate size of the British expatriate community is 3,250.

Disarmament

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any formal reply to criticisms of United Kingdom policy on involvement in nuclear disarmament negotiations by the Soviet Foreign Minister and Deputy Foreign Minister at the United Nations third special session on disarmament on 8 June.

Mr. Eggar: No formal response has been made to the speech by Mr. Shevardnadze. As the Government of the Soviet Union know, we strongly support the INF agreement and the goal of an agreement to reduce the strategic nuclear weapons of the superpowers by 50 per cent.

Nuclear Submarines

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent communications he has had with officials of the United States Government concerning the release to Canada of confidential information on nuclear submarines obtained under the Anglo-American mutual defence agreement.

Mr. Eggar: The protection of confidential and other sensitive information on nuclear submarine propulsion, made available under the 1958 United States/United Kingdom agreement for co-operation in the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes, is governed by articles VI and VII of that agreement, as amended.

Agreement was reached with the United States in 1987 for the release of the appropriate information to Canada and the United States Department of State publicly announced this on 28 October.

Chile

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representatives of Her Majesty's embassy in Santiago, Chile will be attending the Chile Crea congress.

Mr. Eggar: The Chile Crea arts festival incorporates a wide range of cultural events. Various members of Her Majesty's embassy in Santiago will be attending the festival.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representation Her Majesty's Government will send to Chile to observe the plebiscite due before October 1989.

Mr. Eggar: We do not intend to send an observer delegation to the Chilean plebiscite.

EMPLOYMENT

Training Commission

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the names of the current members of the Training Commission, together with the dates and duration of their appointments.

Mr. Cope: The current members of the Training Commission, together with the dates and duration of their appointments, are:

Sir James Munn (Chairman)
22 October 1987 to 31 August 1988
Mr. Michael Bett
27 September 1986 to 31 December 1988
Professor Kenneth Durrands
1 January 1986 to 31 December 1988
Councillor James Gilchrist
27 September 1986 to 31 December 1988
Mr. Roy Grantham
1 January 1986 to 31 December 1988
Mr. Roy Jackson
23 July 1987 to 31 December 1988
Mr. John Peake
1 January 1986 to 31 December 1988
Councillor John Pearman
1 January 1986 to 31 December 1988
Mr. Richard Price
1 January 1986 to 31 December 1988

BDH Chemicals Ltd.

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ensure that the results of the inquiry conducted on behalf of his Department into the cause and effects of fire at BDH Chemicals Ltd. in Poole on 21 June are made public; and if he will also set up a public inquiry.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive proposes to make available to the public a summary of the results of its investigation into the cause of the fire.

I do not propose to set up a public inquiry, since this would be unlikely to identify any causes or contributory factors which will not be identified by the HSE investigation.

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to appoint a chairman for the Training Commission.

Mr. Fowler: The appointment of the present chairman, Sir James Munn, ends on 31 August this year. I am today announcing that I am appointing Mr. Brian Wolfson, chairman of Wembley Stadium Ltd. and currently also chairman of the British Institute of Management, as chairman from 1 September. Mr. Wolfson's period of appointment is for three years.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Sir James Munn for his many achievements during his period of office.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Community Care

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if the current National Health Service review is considering the issues raised by the Griffiths report on community care.

Mr. Moore: The NHS review is concentrating on hospital services. We are also considering Sir Roy Griffiths' recommendations on community care, taking account of the proposals on residential care from the committee chaired by Lady Wagner, and the reactions to both reports. We will bring forward our own proposals in this area in due course.

Children (Supplementary Benefit)

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table from the "Low Income Families Statistics 1985" showing the number of children in Great Britain living below, on or up to 40 per cent. above, supplementary benefit level in 1985; and what proportion of all children they represent in each case.

Mr. Portillo: The information is set out in the table:

Children in families Great Britain 1985

	Number (thousand)	Percentage of all children
Receiving supplementary benefit or housing benefit supplement (HBS)	1,890	15
Not receiving supplementary benefit or (HBS) but with:
—relative net resources below 100 per cent. of the supplementary benefit scale rates	360	3
—relative net resources below 140 per cent. of the supplementary benefit scale rates	1,650	13

Hospital Closures

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list hospitals in the Greater London area that have been closed since 1979; how many are still empty; what plans exist for the development of these hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: A list of all hospitals/units in Greater London which we are aware have been approved for closure from 1979 to the end of 1986 is as follows. Information on the current status of the buildings in question is not held centrally. The closure of old hospitals or units is often associated with the opening of new modern hospitals or units. The hon. Member may wish to write to the relevant health authority in respect of any case in which he is particularly interested.

Health Authorities

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the salary paid to each of the regional chairpersons of health authorities covering the Greater London area.

Mrs. Currie: Chairmen of regional health authorities are entitled to receive remuneration which currently stands at £11,709 a year. They may as an alternative choose to claim financial loss allowance. Chairmen are also entitled to claim travelling and subsistence allowances.

Consultancies

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 Jauary 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Moore: Details of management and computer consultancy contracts extant as at 1 January 1987 are as follows:

Single-parent Families

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of single-parent families drawing supplementary benefit for the latest available date; and what is the proportion of these claimants who have been drawing supplementary benefit for (a) more than five years but less than 10 years, and (b) more than 10 years.

Mr. Portillo: The most recent information available comes from the 1987 annual statistical inquiry. The number of lone-parent families in receipt of supplementary benefit was 629,000 in May 1987; 25 per cent. of these families had been in receipt of benefit for more than five years. Statistics are not kept on the number of lone-parent families who draw benefit for 10 years or more.

Benefits

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of (a) men and (b) women receiving (i) invalidity benefit and (ii) severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Scott: At April 1987, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of people in receipt of invalidity benefit and severe disablement allowance was:

	Invalidity benefit	Severe Disablement Allowance
Men	754,000	102,000
Women	214,000	158,000

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress on the conversion of supplementary benefit cases to income support at his Department's offices in Hackney, Stoke Newington, Shoreditch, Hoxton and Finsbury Park; what percentages of cases have to date been converted; and, in respect of those offices that have not yet completed the conversion, when each office expects to have finished the conversion exercise.

Mr. Portillo: The conversion exercise has been completed.

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the number of supplementary benefit and income support claims received in the last four-week period for which records are available and the percentage of claims awaiting a decision at the end of that four-week period; and if he will supply this information in respect of (i) his Department's Hackney office, (ii) his Department's Stoke Newington office, (iii) his Department's Finsbury Park office, (iv) London north region as a whole and (v) London south region as a whole.

Mr. Portillo: Since the introduction of income support, management information on claims has been recorded calendar monthly instead of four-weekly. The figures in the table relate to the month ended 31 May 1988:

	Supplementary Benefit		Income Support
	Claims received during period	[1] Percentage awaiting decision at end	Claims received during period	[1] Percentage awaiting decision at end
National	30,416	18·0	283,837	21·0
Hackney	33	5·1	706	23·2
Stoke Newington	nil	44·6	417	44·8
Finsbury Park	49	31·5	957	47·9
London North Region	2,510	25·1	40,695	30·3
London South Region	2,783	21·0	38,194	25·0

[1] This is the percentage of all claims held awaiting a decision—not a percentage of those cases received during the month.

This information was obtained from internal regional management statistical returns.

Income Levels

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the population exist at or below a level at which means-tested benefits become available; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Portillo: There is no single income level at which income-related benefits become available, since this varies both by benefit and by claimant. However, the 1983 and 1985 versions of "Low Income Families" (copies of which are in the Library) indicate the numbers receiving supplementary benefit and those below 100 per cent. of the supplementary benefit scale rates for the years requested. For a detailed discussion of this approach see "Low Income Statistics—Report Of A Technical Review" March 1988, and for alternative approaches see "Households Below Average Income: 1981-85," copies of which are also in the Library.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what medical advice has been received concerning myalgic encephalomyelitis post viral syndrome; and if it is intended to recognise it as grounds for mobility allowances.

Mrs. Currie: The Department's medical advisers are keeping in touch with developments on myalgic encephalomyelitis. The medical eligibility criteria for mobility allowance are framed in terms of inability or virtual inability to walk due to physical disablement, irrespective of any specifically diagnosed cause of such inability, and we have no present plans to change those criteria.

Health Authorities (Greater London)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the proposed amalgamation of health authorities in Greater London; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have received no representations concerning the amalgamation of health authorities in Greater London.

Means-tested Benefits (Wales)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the number of families claiming means-tested state benefits for each of the counties of Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that this information is not available.

Baby Foods

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to ensure, following the almonella outbreak caused by powdered baby foods produced in France, that the replacement stock from the same factory is not also contaminated.

Mrs. Currie: The company undertook extensive environmental cleansing and more intensive end product testing from the beginning of May 1988, and investigations by the French official inspection services showed no contamination with salmonella. It has therefore been agreed that withdrawn products may be replaced with those manufactured after May 1988. To date there have been no cases of salmonellosis in the United Kingdom which can be confirmed as being associated with Milupa products.

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if the brand of powdered baby milk which was withdrawn from the market in the United Kingdom on 4 July has been withdrawn from sale in any other European country.

Mrs. Currie: The powdered baby milk which was withdrawn from the United Kingdom market on 4 July was prepared exclusively for the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland, and, as far as we are aware, action has been taken in those two countries only. We have not been advised that any other European country has withdrawn supplies.

Hospital Deaths

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards the publication of death lists for individual hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Data are not available centrally for deaths in individual hospitals. We have no objection to the publication of such data locally, but it is important that they should be interpreted in the light of local circumstances, taking account of the type of hospital and the age, sex and medical condition of the patients concerned.

As regards data at district health authority level, it is intended to include in the next national performance indicator package mortality rates for deaths anywhere in the district from selected conditions. Such data have been included in the past in the indicator package produced by Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy at the Birmingham health services management centre. Consideration is also being given to the introduction in the national indicator package of data at health authority level on deaths in hospital by specialty.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take in the light of the report entitled "Hospital Deaths—The Missing Link" by Paul Kind, concerning the detailed death rates in regional health authorities, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We are studying the report carefully and will take it into account in our consideration of how to improve the assessment of the outcome of health care. As the report makes clear, there are considerable difficulties in interpreting this type of data and conclusions can be drawn only after detailed local inquiry. Certain proposals along the lines suggested by the report are already under consideration following consultation on the contents of the next national performance indicator package.

New Hospital, Hove

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that he will reach no decision on any application by the Brighton health authority for approval in principle for a new hospital in Hove until the full implications for development of hospitals in the Worthing and district health authority have been analysed and the potential waste of public funds examined; if he will make a statement on the joint option appraisal referred to in the parliamentary answer to the right hon. Member for Worthing of 20 May, Official Report, column 592; and why an approval in principle application has been made before this has been completed.

Mrs. Currie: The position remains as indicated in my earlier reply. Departmental officials will be meeting senior managers of the two regional health authorities involved at the end of this month to discuss the outcome of their consideration of future hospital developments in Worthing and Brighton. The approval in principle submission relating to capital developments in Brighton has not yet been submitted formally to the Department by South East Thames RHA.

Departmental Offices (Staff)

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the staffing allocations for 1988-89, as determined by the agreed complementing system, for his Department's offices in Hackney, Stoke Newington, Shoreditch, Hoxton and Finsbury Park; and what were the comparable staffing levels in 1987-88.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested is as follows:

	1987-1988	1988-1989
Hackney	210·5	192
Stoke Newington	141·5	129
Shoreditch	95·5	89
Hoxton	163·0	145
Finsbury Park	224·0	208

The reduction in complements results largely from the replacement of supplementary benefit by income support and the fall in numbers of unemployed claimants.

Regional Authorities (Chairmen)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will announce the appointment of regional health authority chairmen from 1 August.

Mr. Moore: The terms of office of eight of the 14 regional health authority chairmen expire on 31 July 1988. I have made three new appointments as follows:

South West Thames—Mrs. J. F. Cumberlege CBE
Wessex—Mr. R. W. Buchanan
North Western—Mr. R. B. Martin QC

These appointments run until 31 July 1990.

The chairmen of the following five regional health authorities have accepted my invitation to serve in this most important position for another two years each:

Northern—Sir Bernard Tomlinson
Yorkshire—Mr. B. Askew
North West Thames—Mr. W. Doughty
North East Thames—Mr. D. Berriman
Oxford—Sir Gordon Roberts

I should like to place on record my appreciation of the distinguished service given to the National Health Service by the three outgoing regional chairmen: Sir Antony Driver (South West Thames), Sir Bryan Thwaites (Wessex) and Sir John Page OBE (North Western).

Benefits (Order Books)

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to make any changes in the arrangements for handling foils from order books after encashment at post offices.

Mr. Portillo: An internal study recommended that certain accounting work presently carried out by the Post Office at Chesterfield and Edinburgh could be carried out more efficiently and economically at the paid order store operated by the Department of Health and Social Services (Northern Ireland) on behalf of this Department.

Following a review of the proposals, and in consultation with the Post Office, I have agreed to a trial in a small area to start in January 1989.

The proposed change in procedures has no effect on the counter network.

Publications

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all publications regarding benefits for which he is responsible since 1979, indicating which of these were published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 9 February 1988]: Apart from the numerous leaflets on social security benefits, which are all produced through HMSO, details of publications and their publishers, and, where appropriate, the authors, are printed in the "DHSS Sectional List" produced annually by HMSO and in the "Catalogue of British Official Publications not published by HMSO" (Chadwick Healy). Copies of both publications for the years 1979-87 are available in the Library. In addition, arrangements have been made to place a copy in the Library of the current "DHSS-DATA database of DHSS publications not published by HMSO". This publication is updated every two months.

SCOTLAND

Wormit (Rail Halt)

Mr. Menzies Campell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had in connection with the establishment of a rail halt at Wormit; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Since June 1987 one representation has been received about the provision of a rail halt at Wormit.

Responsibility for providing rail services is a matter for British Rail. Each year it receives grant from the Government in recognition of its obligation to provide passenger services. The level of grant is determined on a network-wide basis and it is for British Rail to decide how the resources available to it can best be deployed.

Trunk Roads (Fife and Tayside)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what effect on the trunk road network in Fife and Tayside he anticipates there will be as a result of current repairs to the Tay road bridge; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No significant effect is expected.

Legal Aid Board

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the current members of the Scottish Legal Aid Board, their qualifications for membership, the duration of their appointments, and their rate of remuneration.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is as follows:

Period of Appointment

Chairman	From	To	Background
Mr. Donald B. Grant TD CA	20 October 1986	31 March 1990	Business
Members
Mrs. Christine Davis	17 November 1986	31 March 1989	Consumer Affairs

Mr. John A. C. Weir	1 December 1986	31 March 1990	Sheriff Courts
Mr. Brian Gill QC	1 July 1987	31 March 1990	Advocate

The chairman receives a salary of £18,300 for part-time service. Members' remuneration for part-time service is based on a full-time equivalent salary of £24,000 per annum which is under review. At present two members receive £4,800 per annum (for one day per week), five receive £7,200 per annum (for one and half days per week) and six receive £9,600 per annum (for two days per week).

Travelling People's Site (Dundee)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will publish the funding of the Official Reporter's inquiry into the establishment of a travelling people's site within the Dundee district authority area.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I assume that the hon. Member has in mind the report of the public local inquiry into the city of Dundee district council's proposals for a travellers' site at Panmurefield, Broughty Ferry. The report of the public local inquiry has been sent to the district council and other interested parties today together with notification of my right hon. and learned Friend's decision to accept the Reporter's recommendation that planning consent should be refused. I have written to the hon. Member today with details of the decision.

Aero Technologies

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on progress in the investigation into allegations of wrongdoing by Aero Technologies of Cumbernauld and Glenrothes; and whether charges are to be brought against Alexander McDonald, Terence Byrne, Terence Byrne jnr. and Alan Crossley, directors of the company.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A search warrant was granted by the sheriff at Airdrie on 29 June and has been executed by officers of Strathclyde police, who are continuing with inquiries. I have nothing further to add.

Wildlife

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report, in respect of each year since the coming into force of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, the number of reported incidents involving the misuse of poisons or stupefying substances against wildlife, the number of each wildlife species involved, the number of such cases referred to the police or procurator fiscal for investigation, the number of investigations which resulted in legal proceedings and the outcome of those proceedings.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers of incidents, affected species and cases referred to the police or procurator fiscal involving the misuse of poisons or stupefying substances against wildlife in Scotland, as confirmed by the wildlife incident investigation service, in each of the years from 1981 to date are given in the table. The table includes statistics of incidents of poisoned bait being laid where the victims were domestic animals or there were no reported victims, since poisoned bait is usually targeted against wildlife pests. No statistics of legal proceedings by category of offence under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 are available centrally.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has provided to local authorities and land owners, under section 17 of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, concerning the use of pesticides and their effects on wild birds.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Drafts of codes of practice prepared under the provisions of section 17 of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 have been circulated to interested bodies, including the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the Scottish Landowners Federation and the National Farmers Union of Scotland, with a view to codes being laid before Parliament in due course. The draft code on the agricultural and commercial horticultural use of pesticides provides advice on the safe use of pesticides, including measures to be taken to protect wildlife.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to what advice or publicity local authorities have provided to the public under section 25(1) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, on the legal provisions concerning the poisoning of wild birds.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My Department has drawn local authorities' attention to their responsibilities under section 25(1) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. I have, however, no information as to the advice or publicity which local authorities may have provided to the public under the provisions of that section.

Housing Support Grant

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will update the information contained in the answer of 26 October 1987, Official Report, column 118, on the housing support grant or equivalent figure for Scotland, repriced for inflation for each year since 1978; and if he will give the percentage change over the previous year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the table:

Year	Amount of grant paid at 1988-89 average prices[1] £	Percentage change over previous year
1978-79	—[2]	—
1979-80	391,595,559	—

Housing Corporation

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will update the information in the answer of 19 February, Official Report, column 776, on the gross allocation, repriced for inflation, to the Housing Corporation in Scotland for each year since 1974; and if he will give the percentage change over the previous year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is shown in the table:

Public Transport Companies (Scottish Bus Group)

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether Grampian Public Transport Company, Lothian Public Transport Company, Strathclyde Public Transport Company and Tayside Public Transport Company will be eligible to bid for any parts of the Scottish Bus Group when it is privatised; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Two of the main objectives of the privatisation of the Scottish Bus Group are to increase competition and create new Scottish-based private sector companies. These objectives would not be served by the purchase of Scottish Bus Group subsidiaries by local authority-owned public transport companies.

Civil Justice Review

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, if the civil justice review White Paper proposed to be published in spring or early summer in the current year dealing with common law damages procedure will have application to Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 18 April 1988]: The civil justice review currently being undertaken by the Lord Chancellor applies only to England and Wales. The responsibility for recommending changes in the rules governing the procedures and practices followed in civil proceedings in the Court of Session and the sheriff court falls to the rules councils for those courts. The rules review group set up by the Court of Session is currently examining in detail the rules of that court with a view to ensuring that procedures are as efficient and expeditious as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

London Residuary Body

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on London Residuary Body appointments.

Mr. Chope: The following have been reappointed to the London Residuary Body for the period 12 August 1988 to 31 December 1990 or until the residuary body has discharged its responsibilities arising from abolition of the Greater London council, whichever is sooner:

Members: A. Blakemore, CBE
Councillor Sir Peter Bowness, CBE
J. Esling
W. J. Mackenzie, OBE
M. C. Roberts
J. Wolkind, CBE

These reappointments reflect my right hon. Friend's satisfaction with the great progress made so far by the London Residuary Body and his confidence in its ability to maintain the momentum towards completion of the work arising from abolition of the GLC. The financial benefits resulting from the removal of an expensive and unnecessary tier of London government are now being realised. Only two years on from abolition successor boroughs have already received from the London Residuary Body £129 million in revenue balances that can be directly applied to reduce the rates. By the end of this financial year they can expect to have received some £238 million in capital receipts that can be used to reduce borrowing and enhance capital programmes. These are impressive achievements, on which I congratulate the chairman, Sir Godfrey Taylor, and the members of his board.

Disabled People (Facilities)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on the incorporation in all newly developed or built Government offices of modern facilities for the employment of disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: It is the Government's policy to provide facilities wherever possible for disabled people using Government buildings. Design standards have been developed and are incorporated at the design stage of new Crown buildings. It is also the Government's policy to comply with existing legislation affecting the provision of facilities for disabled people.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made in discussions to strengthen existing laws for the removal of rubbish by private contractors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: A number of measures to strengthen the law on waste disposal were announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 29 June, at column 1698.

Rating Reform

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he received in favour of the extract of names and addresses from the community charge register being sold by local authorities, and how many representations against it being sold.

Mr. Howard: We received half a dozen representations in favour of the extract being sold and more than 40 against.

Pollution

Mr. Crowther: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects a significant improvement to be achieved in the levels of pollution in the Rivers Don and Rother.

Mr. Moynihan: The Rivers Don and Rother are among the most polluted rivers in the country and are classified as either poor (class 3) or bad (class 4) quality for most of their length. The objective for both rivers set by the Yorkshire water authority is for fair quality (class 2). This should be achieved in the current year for the Don upstream of Sheffield and the Rother south of Chesterfield. A major programme for upgrading and extending Sheffield's sewage treatment works and sewerage system, combined with improved trade effluent discharges, should result in the Don downstream of the Blackburn Meadows sewage treatment works attaining fair (class 2) quality by 1995. Through Sheffield itself, upgrading to a consistent class 2 quality standard will take longer—up to the end of the century—although the river can already support some fish life. Improvements to the remainder of the Rother —mainly through the extension of sewage treatment works capacity—should enable upgrading to class 2 quality during the period 1995-2000.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response the United Kingdom will make to the proposal by the Prime Minister of Norway at the Toronto world conference on the changing atmosphere for an extensive technology transfer programme for modern and low polluting technologies, with particular emphasis on the needs of developing countries.

Mr. Moynihan; My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has responded to the points raised by Mrs. Brundtland, in a written answer given today.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations were made by his Department at the world conference on the changing atmosphere: implications for global security, held in June at Toronto.

Mr. Moynihan: My noble Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water sent a message to the conference, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Waste Imports

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if there are any biochemical checks made on wastes imported into the United Kingdom from the United States of America to assess the dioxin content of the wastes, particularly those containing paper materials.

Mr. Moynihan: It is the responsibility of waste disposal authorities to decide whether testing is necessary to determine the contents of any waste, including imported waste prior to disposal.

Council House Sales

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what the maximum cash discount under the Housing Act 1980 would now be, uprated in line with house price inflation in the Greater London area.

Mr. Waldegrave: The maximum discount on council house sales would be £43,000 if the figure of £35,000 set in January 1987 were to be raised by the percentage increase in London house prices between the first quarters of 1987 and 1988.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of London borough of Camden tenants who applied to buy their homes prior to 23 November 1987 who are still awaiting conveyancing.

Mrs. Roe: The latest statistical return on the council's right-to-buy performance reported 606 cases where completion was pending at the end of May. The returns do not give the dates of the tenants' applications. I am meeting the leader of the council shortly to discuss its handling of sales.

Empty Houses

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide figures showing both the numbers and percentages of empty houses in (i) the public sector and (ii) the private sector in each local housing authority.

Mrs. Roe [holding answer 14 July 1988]: The latest information is for April 1987, from the English authorities' housing investment programme returns, and was included in the table which was sent to the hon. Member on 14 July. All authorities provided figures for their own stock, and these have been shown separately; they exclude closed dwellings, of which there where 2,200 in England. Authorities' information about other vacant housing is generally less accurate and some authorities were unable to provide estimates.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the increase in theft and violence since May 1979; and whether he will include in the Official Report a table showing the increase in the number of (i) thefts and (ii) violent crimes in the decades ending in 1968, 1978 and 1988 in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: The available figures are summarised in the table. Comparable figures for theft and handling stolen goods are not available before 1969 because of changes introduced by the Theft Act 1968; there is also some lack of comparability from 1980 due to changes in the counting rules. Figures on notifiable offences recorded by the police are published annually in chapter 2 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", of which the most recent issue is for 1986 (Cm. 233). Figures for 1987 were published in Home Office statistical bulletin 6/88 and will be included in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1987" later this year; and figures for the first quarter of 1988 were published in Home Office statistical bulletin 19/88; copies of these publications are available in the Library.

Pet Animals (Convention)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with what bodies or persons he is in consultation in regard to the signing by the United Kingdom of the European convention for the protection of pet animals, including article 10 of that convention; and when he expects those consultations to be completed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Consultation on the report on animal mutilations by the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, which is relevant to article 10 of the convention, is almost complete. The following organisations have been involved:

The British Veterinary Association
The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals
The University Federation for Animal Welfare
The Joint Advisory Committee on Pets in Society
The National Canine Defence League
Pro-Dogs
The British Horse Society
The Horse Race Betting Levy Board
The Jockey Club
The National Trainers Federation
The Master of Foxhounds Association
The Association of British Riding Schools
The Governing Council of the Cat Fancy
The Cats Protection League
The People's Dispensary for Sick Animals
The Blue Cross
The New Forest Pony Breeding and Cattle Society
The Verderers of the New Forest
The New Forest Commoners Defence Association
The Exmoor Pony Society
The National Joint Equine Welfare Committee
The Horses and Ponies Protection Committee
The British Association for Shooting and Conservation
The Kennel Club
The Council for Docked Breeds

It is hoped to complete consultation about the convention as a whole by this autumn. As with the RCVS report, we shall consult all organisations known to us as likely to have an interest, but in addition will welcome views from any other source.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the cost to the Metropolitan police of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the cost to the Metropolitan police of employing management and computer consultants, including agency staff, for the following financial years, was:

Financial Year	Cost £
1984-85	681,000
1985-86	1,643,000
1986-87	2,820,000
1987-88	1,643,000

Information is not available in this form prior to 1984-85.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in the Metropolitan police as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the following contracts, with management and computer consultants, were extant as at 1 January 1987:

Company	Subject of Assignment
Gerard Systems	Artemis planning system
ICL	Police personnel and recruitment projects
ICL	Database maintenance team
Peat, Marwick, McLintock	Relocation of Stores

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of his Department towards allowing telephones to be installed in prisons for inmates to be allowed to contact their families in cases where visits from relatives, due to distance to travel, illness or age, are difficult to make.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Cardphones are provided for use by convicted inmates at open establishments and arrangements are in hand to extend this facility to convicted inmates in certain category C establishments and certain female and young offender establishments.

Unconvicted prisoners are allowed to use official telephones in certain circumstances, including where there are urgent domestic reasons. Governors also exercise their discretion in considering requests from convicted inmates to use official telephones.

Prisoners (Foreign Nationals)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the present number of (a) men and (b) women who are foreign nationals and who are serving prison sentences in prisons in the United Kingdom on 30 June:

(2) how many foreign nationals are at present serving life sentences in prisons in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is estimated from records held centrally, which are approximate, that on 31 March 1988 about 600 male and 50 female sentenced prisoners in prison department establishments were of foreign nationality, excluding citizens of Commonwealth countries, Pakistan and Eire. Of these, about 80 were serving life sentences. The recording of nationality for citizens of Commonwealth countries, Pakistan and Eire is not sufficiently reliable for estimates of their numbers to be given.

Prison Facilities

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison facilities are counted as a national resource on the lines of C wing and the segregation unit at Parkhurst; and how many such facilities have received Butler trust awards.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There is a unit comparable to C wing, Parkhurst, at Lincoln prison and a third is planned to open at Hull in November 1988. These units cater for prisoners presenting control problems which cannot be dealt with in normal long-term prison conditions. There are special security units for prisoners who require the highest security conditions, at Leicester and Parkhurst. A third will open later this year at Full Sutton prison. The work of the staff at Parkhurst C wing has been recognised by a Butler trust award.

Unpaid Fines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total amount of unpaid fines; and whether delays in their enforcement are being occasioned by the lack of staff in magistrates' courts.

Mr. John Patten: The total amount of fines and fees outstanding at magistrates' courts in England and Wales at 31 December 1987 was £84,660,000. Part of this sum consists of fines in respect of which the time allowed for payment had not expired. We are not aware of any general shortage of fine enforcement staff. Applications for grant on the costs of additional staff may be made if a need is perceived: such applications are considered on their merits, having regard to total available provision.

European Parliament (Electoral Systems)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the choice of electoral system for the 1989 elections to the European Parliament.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Representations have been received from two hon. Members in recent months about the electoral system to be used at the European parliamentary elections in 1989. The European Parliament has yet to agree on a uniform procedure for elections, and the electoral system used in the United Kingdom at the 1989 elections will be the same as in 1984: in Great Britain the simple majority system, and in Northern Ireland the system of a single transferable vote.

Wandsworth Prison

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what matters he discussed during his recent visit to Wandsworth prison; if he will list the people he met during his visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend has not visited HM prison Wandsworth recently, but I did so on 4 July. In the course of the visit I had meetings with the governor, senior management, representatives of the board of visitors, the Whitley committee and, at their request, a separate meeting with the local branch of the Prison Officers' Association. In addition, in the course of a tour of the establishment I had conversations with individual officers, and also took the opportunity to speak to inmates. The questions of staffing complements, overcrowding, integral sanitation and the position of prisoners separated under rule 43 were among the issues discussed. During my visit I gave particular attention to industries, rule 43, sanitation arrangements and an experimental method of installing integral sanitation.

TV-am

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied that TV-am is currently producing programmes fully in accordance with the terms of its franchise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: It is for the IBA to judge whether or not a programme contractor is fulfilling its contractual obligations in accordance with the Broadcasting Act 1981.

Sporting Events (Public Order)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions there have been in 1988 to date for public order offences associated with sporting events.

Mr. John Patten: It is not possible from information collected centrally to identify those public order offences which take place at sporting events.

Alcohol-related Public Disorder

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about encouraging breweries, publicans and licensing justices to co-operate with local police in identifying troublemakers in public houses and premises where under-age drinking takes place, with a view to combating alcohol-related public disorders.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received no specific representations, but we endorse the need for the brewers, licensees, courts and the police to work together to curb the problems of disorderly conduct and under-age drinking. We shall stress the importance of co-operation in forthcoming meetings and in guidance to be issued shortly by the Department.

Rural Hooliganism

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he plans to take to increase the resources available to police forces in rural counties to combat drunken hooliganism and assaults on police officers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Non-metropolitan forces have received 3,166 extra police posts under this Government and their strength has increased by 4,660 police officers. In addition, substantial numbers of police officers have been redeployed from administrative duties. With my colleagues I shall continue to keep the size of planned increases in police establishments under review.

Remand

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his Department's latest assessment is of the average time spent on remand in custody by people awaiting trial.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the average time spent on remand in prison department establishments is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales", at table 2(a) of the latest issue, for 1986, Cm. 210, copies of which are in the Library. The initial indications from provisional data reported in Home Office statistical bulletin 8/88, "The Prison Population in 1987", are that there was very little change in 1987.

Open Prison (Lymm)

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he has any plans to site an open prison at Lymm, in Cheshire.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No.

Video Cassettes (Sex and Violence)

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures are taken to confiscate foreign imported videos depicting perverted sexual practices and violence.

Mr. Renton: The police have powers under the Obscene Publications Act 1959, on a warrant from a magistrate, to seize articles which they believe to be obscene and kept for gain and bring them before a magistrates' court. If the court decides that the articles are obscene and kept for gain or if a person is convicted of keeping them for gain, the court must order their forfeiture. It is for the police to decide when to seek a warrant for the seizure of articles. The courts also have powers when a person is convicted for any offence under the Video Recordings Act 1984 to order the forfeiture of any video recordings related to the offence.

In addition, officers of Customs and Excise have power under the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 to seize articles which they believe to be obscene and to have been imported unlawfully. Such articles are deemed to be forfeited unless the importer can satisfy a court that they are not obscene or unlawfully imported.

Los Van Van Group (Visas)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the reasons for the delay in ensuring visa clearance for entry to the Los Van Van group of musicians from Cuba, who have work permits for two engagements in the United Kingdom on 14 and 15 July.

Mr. Renton: There was no undue delay in this case. Applications were submitted at the British embassy in Havana on 1 July and, on confirmation that work permits had been issued for the two planned engagements, visas were authorised on 13 July.

Armley Prison, Leeds

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many suicides there have been in Armley prison, Leeds, during the last three months; on what dates they took place; what were the ages of those involved; for what crimes they were sentenced; and to what extent their imprisonment in Armley was due to a shortage of accommodation in other prisons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There have been two apparent suicides, yet to be confirmed as such at inquests, at Leeds prison during the last three months, on 28 May and the night of 29-30 June. Those involved were aged 17 and 18; both were remanded in custody, facing charges of aggravated burglary, and of theft and taking a vehicle without the owner's consent, respectively. Neither was held at Leeds because of shortage of accommodation elsewhere.

Police—Environmental Health Officers (Liaison)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to chief officers of police on liaison between police forces and environmental health officers on areas of mutual concern; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are not aware of the need for any such guidance, but if my hon. Friend is aware of a particular problem I should be grateful if he would inform me of it.

Bail

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals to eradicate any disparities in the granting of bail as between black and white defendants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 12 July 1988]: Decisions on whether bail should be granted in any particular case are entirely a matter for the courts.

Research is currently being undertaken in the Home Office into the experience of ethnic minorities in the criminal justice system. This will include the question of bail. The results of this research are expected to be published early next year.

Police (Establishment)

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by rank for the present year and for each of the last nine years the total establishments permitted for the Metropolitan police force and for each of the provincial police forces, together with the figure for the actual staffing levels by rank for each year for each force.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report, the number of police officers for each force in England and Wales; and if he will separately distinguish for each force the number from each rank.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answers 24 June and 30 June 1988]: The information requested is given in the table:

E = Authorised establishment at 1 June 1988.
S = Actual force strength at 20 April 1988.

TRANSPORT

East Coast Railway Line

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning overcrowding on trains on the main InterCity east coast line; and what discussions he has had with British Rail on the subject.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received two representations. The replies to both made it clear that this is a management matter for BR.

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to how many passengers travel per day, on average, on all or part of the main east coast rail line between London King's Cross and the north-east of England.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Department does not keep information of this kind.

Airlines (Persian Gulf)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the Government will advise United Kingdom airlines not to overfly any part of the Persian Gulf.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. We are in close touch with British airlines operating in the region about measures to safeguard their operations. We fully support initiatives in ICAO to provide for alternative air routes in the region so as to enhance the future safety of international civil aviation.

Roadworks

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list (i) grant-related expenditure for capital and current highways work by local authorities in England for 1988-89 and (ii) the budgets for capital and current highways work by local authorities in England for 1988-89.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Figures for grant-related expenditure and budgets for highways maintenance (including street lighting) for highway authorities in England in 1988-89 are set out in table 1.

Budgets for capital expenditure in 1988-89 are not yet available. The capital allocations for 1988-89 are set out in table 2. The costs of financing them are incorporated with that for the capital programmes for all other services in the GREs for financing new capital expenditure. They are not separately identifiable.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the annual inquiries to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre relate to vehicle excise duty issues.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: About 230,000 of the 2·4 million written and telephone inquiries received at DVLC during 1987 related to vehicle licensing procedures or to specific licensing transactions. There is no breakdown of the 5 million inquiries dealt with by magnetic tape. Most were likely to have related to vehicle keeper and other registration details rather than licensing.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department was first approached about the possible purchase of No. 8 Camrose street, SE2, in connection with the east London river crossing; and why it has not yet been possible to reach a decision.

Mr. Channon: The owner of 8 Camrose street asked the Department to buy the property on compassionate grounds last September. Following further inquiries, the way is now clear for the Department to do so, without prejudice to the decisions still to be taken on the ELRC scheme. The district valuer will be commencing negotiations with the owner.

Traffic Patterns (Toll Roads)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies have been undertaken by his Department on the likely effects on traffic patterns of the introduction of toll roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: For London only, the Government have commissioned assessment studies into four particular areas.

It is open to the consultants, as a part of these studies, to consider proposals to charge for the use of specific roads or locations.

Dim-dip Headlights

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the fitting of dim-dip headlights to motor vehicles following the recent decision on this matter by the European Court.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) on 12 July, at columns 140-41.

DVLC

Mr. Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many persons are employed at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre and at what annual cost; how many requests are received per annum as to details of the registered number of a vehicle; and in what period of time the average response for this information is made.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1988, c. 805]: I regret to say that my previous answer contained an error. The total number of inquiries of the vehicle record received by DVLC in 1987 was 7·4 million, not 4·7 million.

ENERGY

Pluto and Dido Reactors

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the safety of the research reactors Pluto and Dido at the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority Atomic Energy research establishment at Harwell.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have nothing to add to the statement made by the Health and Safety Executive on 21 June 1988.

Nuclear Stations (Safety)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has made any response to the proposals made on 9 June by the European Economic Community Environment Commissioner that member states routinely provide nuclear safety details of operations at nuclear plants to the European Commission.

Mr. Michael Spicer: On 9 June 1988 the Commission of the European Communities issued a proposal for a Council directive on informing the population about health protection measures to be applied and steps to be taken in the event of a radiological emergency. These proposals have yet to be discussed.

Renewable Energy

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, in addition to the research priorities set out in "Energy Paper 55," he will review the possibility of further international research and development initiatives, in response to the proposals of the Prime Minister of Norway to the Toronto world conference on the changing atmosphere for a comprehensive international research and information programme on renewable energy.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Where appropriate the United Kingdom is participating in a number of collaborative research programmes, notably within the framework of the International Energy Agency and the European Commission. We are also working closely with the United States Department of Energy under a bilateral agreement. A review of these activities formed a part of the development of our long-term strategy on renewable energy as outlined in "Energy Paper 55".

The United Kingdom plays a full and active part in the International Energy Agency renewables research programmes, which are reviewed regularly by the agency's renewable energy working party. The United Kingdom has also played the leading role in establishing for the agency a comprehensive information energy technology database, which includes renewable energy information. The agreement for this multilateral information programme was signed in January 1987. Copies of a brochure which describes the programme and its objectives are in the Libraries of the House.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy for copies of "Energy paper 55", on "Renewable Energy in the United Kingdom: The Way Forward", to be distributed to public libraries as soon as possible.

Mr. Michael Spicer: As with all HMSO publications, a copy of "Energy Paper 55" has been sent to six main libraries for copyright purposes:
British Library; National Library of Scotland; National Library of Wales; Bodelian Library; Oxford; Cambridge University Library; and Trinity College Library, Dublin.

Copies of all HMSO publications are also sent to the British Library lending division and are available for loan by anyone in the United Kingdom by arrangement with his local library. In addition, 67 main public libraries automatically receive copies. Copies of the energy paper are also available for sale from the many HMSO bookshops and accredited agents throughout the United Kingdom. These arrangements should ensure the energy paper is readily accessible to all those interested in reading about the Government's long-term plans for renewable energy.

Electricity Generation (Wastes)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will set out in tabular form (a) the volume and (b) the toxicity or radiotoxicity of wastes expected to arise from electricity generated, respectively, by (i) coal, (ii) oil, (iii) gas, (iv) nuclear fuel and (v) renewable energies in the years (x) 1979 to present and (y) 1988 to 2025.

Mr. Parkinson: The full information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, in 1985 the CEGB gave evidence to the Royal Commission on environmental pollution on its non-radioactive waste management work; this information was published in the commission's 11th report. The CEGB also contributes to the annual United Kingdom radioactive waste inventory; the 1987 edition of which will be published shortly.

Fast Reactor Programme

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's plans for future public funding of the fast reactor programme at (a) the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority laboratories at Windscale. (b) the authority's laboratories at Harwell and (c) the authority's nuclear power development establishment at Dounreay, in the light of proposals by the authority's chairman to seek private funds for fast reactor development.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Welsh), on 13 June 1988, at column 33.

National Nuclear Corporation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy on whose authority the National Nuclear Corporation has undertaken nuclear development work for the Atomic Weapons Establishment at Aldermaston.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I understand that National Nuclear Corporation has been awarded a contract by the procurement executive of the Ministry of Defence to undertake project management work at the Atomic Weapons Establishment at Aldermaston. This is a matter for the National Nuclear Corporation.

Dounreay

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, in the light of the recently published report by the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Radiation on leukaemia in the vicinity of the Dounreay Nuclear Development Establishment, he will invite the operational safety review team of the International Atomic Energy Agency to review the Dounreay plant.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The COMARE report lists a number of recommendations for further work, which will be implemented by the Departments involved. I do not believe that an OSART mission could make a significant contribution to this further work.

Offshore Operations

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many notices have been served in respect of safety on offshore operations under the terms of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act during each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No prohibition or improvement notices have been issued over the last five years in respect of safety on offshore operations under the terms of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974.

The majority of problems highlighted during an offshore inspection are rectified before the inspector leaves the installation. Where this is not possible, the owner is required to carry out the necessary changes withing a set time limit. Any lessons to be learnt are made available to all offshore operators by means of safety notices issued by the safety directorate of my petroleum engineering division.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will immediately establish an inquiry into the discovery at Drigg of a canister containing plutonium oxide fuel pellets: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: The Health and Safety Executive and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution have begun a joint investigation into the circumstances in which this canister came to be disposed of at Drigg many years ago. They will consider the implications of this discovery and report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and myself. Their conclusions will be made public.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 18 July 1988

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Official Documents (Use of Paper)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will state the amount of paper that was used for official documents in the Houses of Parliament for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Wakeham: This information is not held centrally.

Wines (South Africa)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on the progress of inquiries into the use of the facilities of the House by an hon. Member for the stocking and sale of wines from South Africa.

Mr. Wakeham: The issue covered in the point of order raised by the hon. Member on 30 June had already been brought to the notice of the House authorities. The approved procedures to remedy the situation and prevent further contravention of the rules were invoked and have since been completed.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Inland Revenue (Correspondence)

Mr. Adley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on whose authority the Inland Revenue has withdrawn free post facilities in routine correspondence with taxpayers; how much it is estimated will be saved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 29 January 1988, at column 420 and to the Inland Revenue press release of 29 January 1988.

Voted and Consolidated Fund Receipts

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for 1988-89 (a) voted receipts and (b) Consolidated Fund extra receipts by Department, in a form consistent with (i) Cm. 288 and (ii) the revised basis for 1988-89.

Mr. Major: Details of voted receipts and Consolidated Fund extra receipts by Department are shown in the main supply estimates for 1988-89 published on Budget day—HC 339-I-XX. The estimates booklets provide tables reconciling the supply expenditure being sought with the provision in Cm. 288 for most Departments.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for the period 1982-83 to 1990-91 (a) the public expenditure planning total on the definitions of each of the public expenditure White Papers published since 1979, (b) the general Government expenditure total on the basis of the definitions of each of the White Papers, (c) gross domestic product on the basis taken in each of the White Papers and (d) the public expenditure gross domestic product ratio in the basis of the definitions of each of the White Papers, indicating whether the numerator was based upon the planning total or general Government expenditure.

Mr. Major: There have been no significant changes to the definition of the public expenditure planning total or general Government expenditure since 1979. Though the basic concepts have remained unchanged, there have been a number of detailed reclassifications, which are noted in each year's public expenditure White Paper, which provides a nine-year span of data on consistent definitions. Tables in section 5 of the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1988-89 to 1990-91" (Cm. 288I) include longer runs of data on a consistent basis. An article in the August 1985 issue of Economic Trends provided detailed information on "Measuring Public Expenditure" and in particular gave long runs of data for public expenditure as a percentage of GDP on the various different bases which had been used in the past. It also explained and gave figures for general Government expenditure as a percentage of GDP, the concept which has been in use by the Treasury since the 1985 Autumn Statement. Further information on "Long term trends in public expenditure" was given in the October 1987 issue of Economic Trends. It would involve a disproportionate amount of work to show for each year in the period requested what the planning total or general Government expenditure would have been using the precise classifications in force for each year's White Paper.

Government-owned Companies

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table in cash terms showing, for each of the years 1979-80 to 1988-89 for each of the organisations which has been included in at least one year in the equivalent of table 4.1 of Cm. 288, all write-offs of loans, public dividend capital or other liabilities, and equivalent information on Goverment-owned companies.

Mr. Major: Write-offs of Government loans and debt for public corporations are given in the table for the calendar years 1979-87. It is not possible to forecast write-offs for 1988-89.

Similar information for all companies that have been Government-owned in at least one year from 1979 is not held centrally and could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Year	Organisation	Write-off (at outturn prices) £ million
1980	National Freight Corporation	100
1980	British Airways Board	160
1981	British Steel Corporation	3,509
1981	Scottish Development Agency	2
1981	Welsh Development Agency	1
1982	British Steel Corporation	1,000
1982	British Transport Docks Board	81
1983	Port of London Authority	24
1983	National Dock Labour Board	24

Year	Organisation	Write-off (at outturn prices) £ million
1984	British Telecom	40
1986	New Town Development Corporation	1,591
1986	Development Board for Rural Wales	33

Note: There were no write-offs in 1979, 1985 or 1987.

Nationalised Industries (Expenditure)

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table in cash terms showing, for each of the years in the period 1982-83 to 1987-88 during which they were in public ownership, the advertising, public relations and promotional expenditure for each of the nationalised industries listed in table 4.1 of Cm. 288.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Expenditure for these purposes is a management responsibility of each nationalised industry's board. Information on such costs is not held centrally. For expenditure on advertising of recent privatisation and residual share sales, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 18 January 1988, at column 473.

Income Distribution

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give tables for income distribution for 1987-88 and 1988-89 in the form of his answer to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East on 8 February, Official Report, columns 93-4, for each region of Britain.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 13 June 1988]: Regional estimates for 1987-88 and 1988-89 are not available. Information on the total numbers in each region in 1984-85 by ranges of income similar to those in my earlier reply have been published in "The Survey of Personal Incomes 1984-85". Further analysis of this information by type of taxpayer would not yield reliable results.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the projected reduction in inheritance tax liability of (a) the top 1 per cent., (b) the top 5 per cent., (c) the top 10 per cent., (d) the bottom 70 per cent., (e) the bottom 60 per cent., (f) the bottom 50 per cent. and (g) the bottom 25 per cent. of those liable for inheritance tax in 1988-89 together with the total number of tax units estimated to be liable.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 27 June 1988]: The reduction in inheritance tax liability on transfers in 1988-89 is estimated as follows:

Proportion of taxable estates	£ million
(a) top 1 per cent.	50
(b) top 5 per cent.	110
(c) top 10 per cent.	140
(d) bottom 70 per cent.	50
(e) bottom 60 per cent.	45
(f) bottom 50 per cent.	40
(g) bottom 25 per cent.	35

There are expected to be about 20,000 taxable estates for 1988-89, with a total reduction in tax of £220 million. The reductions in tax are relative to the 1987-88 rate scale, indexed to 1988-89 by reference to the statutory formula.

Earnings

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many and what proportion of taxpayers earn less than two-thirds of median male earnings for the latest available date.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 27 June 1988]: It is estimated that in 1987-88 just over 6 million single people and married couples, representing about 30 per cent. of taxpayers, are liable to tax on gross incomes of less than two thirds of median male earnings. (Median full-time adult male earnings in April 1987 were £198·40 per week). The estimate is based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and is provisional.

Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing, for each region and for Great Britain, the number and percentage of taxpayers paying tax at their top marginal rate for each tax band; their total tax liability expressed in 1988 prices; and the number and percentage of non-taxpaying households; using the most recent available figures.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers there are in each of the income tax bands in each of the English regions, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland; and in each case what proportion of the total number of income tax payers in each region they represent.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his replies, 16 June 1988, c. 272 and 27 May 1988 c. 374]: I regret that incorrect figures for the west midlands and Great Britain were contained in the tables shown in my replies. The corrected information is included in the revised tables. The table showing tax liability has also been revised to include tax paid at composite rate.

Customs Clearance Depots

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what specific regional factors are taken into account when inland customs clearance depot status is determined; and what specific regional factors are taken into account in determining section 8 grants.

Mr. David Mitchell [holding answer 12 July 1988]: I have been asked to reply.

The regional factors to be taken into account by customs when approving an inland customs clearance depot have not been defined. Each case is considered on its merits and any regional considerations put forward would be taken fully into account.

The criteria for awarding section 8 grants are the same throughout Great Britain.

THE ARTS

Libraries

Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last made an official visit to a public library.

Mr. Luce: In the course of the last year I have visited seven public libraries, the last one being the new library at St. Albans, Hertfordshire, in May.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about the proposed premium book subscription for public libraries.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 14 July 1988:] The many responses which I have received include comments on the proposed premium book subscription scheme. The work of analysing these responses has begun.

Black and Asian Arts

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts what has been the level of expenditure, per capita on black and Asian arts in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Luce: Expenditure on black and Asian arts by the Arts Councils of Great Britain, per head of the whole population, amounted to the following sums in each of the last three years:

Great Britain

1985-86	0·01
1986-87	0·02
1987-88	0·02

Note:
The information for earlier years is not readily available.
These figures relate to Arts Council direct expenditure only, and do not take account of expenditure on black and Asian arts by arts organisations whose Arts Council subsidy appears in other categories. Arts Council grants to regional arts associations and to the South Bank centre are also excluded.

Community Arts

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts what has been the level of expenditure, per capita, on community arts in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Luce: Expenditure on community arts by the Arts Councils of Great Britain, per head of the whole population, amounted to the following sums in each of the last three years:

1985-86	0·04
1986-87	0·05
1987-88	0·03

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church of England (Disestablishment)

22. Mr. Allen: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what plans the Church Commissioners have formulated to prepare for any proposed disestablishment of the Church of England.

Mr. Alison: None.

PRIME MINISTER

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will give the cost to the Cabinet Office of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

The Prime Minister: The information is available by financial year. The cost to the Cabinet Office of employing management or computer consultants in each financial year from 1983-84 to 1987-88 is as follows:

Year	£
1983-84	152,000
1984-85	423,818
1985-86	329,334
1986-87	505,092
1987-88	417,778

The information cannot be provided by calendar years throughout the period except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in the Cabinet Office as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

The Prime Minister: The following management or computer consultancy contracts were extant in the Cabinet Office on 1 January 1987:

Firm	Subject or Assignment
Psychometric Research and Development Limited	Analyses contributing to the Civil Service Commission review of executive officer recruitment
Logica	Information handling study

[1] Costs of these studies were shared with other Government Departments.

Malta

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Prime Minister if she has any plans to make an official visit to Malta.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list how many days she has spent outside Great Britain in each year since she became Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: The number of days I have spent outside Great Britain on official business are as follows:

	Number of days
1979	30
1980	17
1981	45
1982	33
1983	38
1984	30

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

British Voice

Dr. Glyn: To ask the Attorney-General if he has any plans to prosecute British Voice for distributing a leaflet, a copy of which has been sent to him, which appears to incite racial discord; and what representations to this effect he has received from the Commission for Racial Equality.

The Attorney-General: Copies of several different leaflets purporting to be printed and published by British Voice have been referred to me, among them two drawn to my attention by the Commission for Racial Equality. At the request of the Director of Public Prosecutions police inquiries have been instituted and they are continuing. No prosecution decision can be reached until they are complete.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in Her Majesty's Land Registry as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

The Attorney-General: The only management or computer consultancy contract extant on 1 January 1987 which affected the Land Registry was a systems engineering contract with IBM United Kingdom Limited.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give the cost to the Lord Chancellor's Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

The Attorney-General: On the information available the cost to the Lord Chancellor's Department of employing management or computer consultants for each financial year from 1983 to 1987 is as follows:

1983-84	41,782
1984-85	433,000
1985-86	262,738
1986-87	185,618
1987-88	361,594

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in the Lord Chancellor's Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

The Attorney-General: The following management and computer consultancy contracts were extant in the Lord Chancellor's Department as at 1 January 1987:

Firm	Assignment
Ernst and Whinney	Systems development audit of Funds Accounting
Atkins Planning	Restructuring of the Project Support Office
Peat Marwick and McLintock	Structured Systems Analysis and Design Methodology (SSADM) Consultancy
Prolog	Assistance with the Crown Court Computer Project

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give the cost to Her Majesty's Land Registry of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

The Attorney-General: Land Registry expenditure on management or computer consultancy for the period 1983-87 was as follows:

Year	Amount £
1983	Nil
1984	119,108
1985	123,445
1986	105,946
1987	487

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

St. John Ophthalmic Hospital, Jerusalem

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Order of St. John seeking funds for emergency programmes at St. John ophthalmic hospital, Jerusalem.

Mr. Chris Patten: In May the Lord Prior of the hospital approached me for assistance in connection with financial problems partly caused by the need for the provision of emergency programmes in Gaza. In response I have offered the hospital £100,000 this financial year towards the costs of its outreach programmes and emergency clinics in Gaza. This is the third grant we have made to the hospital since 1984.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Post-16 Qualifications

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to simplify the range of post-16 qualifications; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The provisions of the Education Reform Bill, if enacted, will enable my right hon. Friend by order to extend the powers relating to approval of qualifications and syllabuses for pupils of compulsory school age, so that they apply also to full-time pupils and students aged 16 to 19.

However, my right hon. Friend has no present plans to seek the extension to the 16-19 age group of any such powers.

Schools (Health and Safety)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he is considering concerning the regulation of health and safety in schools under local financial delegation.

Mr. Dunn: Guidance on health and safety matters is offered in paragraphs 89-91 of the consultative document on "Financial Delegation to Schools", which was issued on 28 April this year.

Secondary Schools (Pupil Costs)

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current average expenditure per secondary school pupil in English local authorities; what is the lowest figure; and what is the highest.

Mrs. Rumbold: Based on actual outturn figures, for 1986-87, local education authorities in England spent an average of £1,340 per secondary school pupil. The figures for individual authorities ranged from £1,145 in Kent to £2,345 in ILEA.

Computer Work Stations

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many computer work stations there are in his Department; what is the ratio of work stations to civil servants; and how he expects this to change over the next five years.

Mrs. Rumbold: On 1 July 1988 there were 1,142 computer work stations of all types in the Department, including Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Schools, encompassing terminals, personal microcomputers, portable computers and text processors.

The total number of staff in the Department, including HMI and all support staff was 2,474. The ratio of work stations to staff was therefore 1:2·2.

The Department has firm plans to increase the number of work stations of all types to around 1,800 over the next three years. This implies a ratio of work stations to staff of 1:1·4 by 1991.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the composition of the senior information technology strategy committee in his Department; and how many times in the past year its meetings have been attended by Ministers.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department's information technology strategy committee comprises the deputy secretary responsible for information technology (chairman), the director of establishments, the director of statistics, the head of information technology branch; and representatives of schools 1 branch, FHE 2 branch, pensions branch, teachers supply and training branch, finance branch, establishments and organisation branch, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Schools, and CCTA.

Ministers have not attended any meetings in the past year.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many of the staff in his Department at grades 1, 2 and 3 have attended courses or training on information technology awareness or management in the last 12 months.

Mrs. Rumbold: One grade 2 officer has attended a course on information technology management in the last 12 months.

Departmental Correspondence (Information Leaks)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary for Education and Science if, pursuant to his answer of 11 July, he will make it his policy to report to the House the action he takes, in the light of the inquiry into the unauthorised leak of information and briefing in relation to correspondence between the private secretary to the Prime Minister, Mr. Paul Gray, and Mr. Tom Jeffrey of his Department.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is not the usual practice to give information on such matters.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what discussions he had with Trafford borough council about the location of a city technology college on the site of the former boy's grammar school in Stretford; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what discussions he has had with Trafford borough council about locating a city technology college or arts technology college on sites in Trafford;

(3) if he will list those outside bodies with which he has had discussions concerning locating a city technology college or arts technology college on sites in Trafford; and if he will list those sites.

Mrs. Rumbold: The City Technology College Trust has been negotiating with the Trafford borough council and the LEA for the purchase of the redundant Stretford boys grammar school. The education committee has shown substantial interest in the establishment of a city technology college, but it has not, as yet, been able to find a way to reconcile this interest with its considerable problems of coping with falling secondary school numbers. my right hon. Friend has had no discussions regarding other sites in Trafford.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Single European Market

Mr. Andrew Mitchell To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consideration he has given to any reforms which may be required to the structure and organisation of the self-regulatory organisations, for financial institutions, in the light of the completion of the single European market.

Mr. Maude: I see no reason why the completion of the single European market in financial services should require any changes in the regulatory structure.

Langford Scott and Partners

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish in the Official Report(i) the total sum of money paid to investors by his Department following the financial collapse of Langford Scott and Partners in April 1983, separately distinguishing capital and interest repayments and (ii) the number of persons to whom payment was made by his Department following the financial collapse of Langford Scott and Partners in April 1983.

Mr. Maude: A total of £68,425·72 was paid to 13 investors. This sum comprised £49,813·20 in capital and £18,612·52 by way of interest. These payments were made ex gratia without admission of liability.

Libya

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the current figures for trade between the United Kingdom and Libya.

Mr. Alan Clark: For the first five months of 1988 imports (cif) were £58·3 million and exports (fob) £90·4 million. These figures should be treated with more than the usual caution because of major changes to customs procedures introduced in January 1988, details of which were given in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) on 7 December 1987, at columns 34-35.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consideration is being given to the extension of Export Credits Guarantee Department cover in respect of trade with Libya; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: ECGD cover for new business with Libya has not been available since 1986. The decision to withdraw cover was made on commercial grounds as a result of the poor payment experience on business covered by ECGD in Libya. At present there are no plans to resume cover.

ECGD keeps cover arrangements for all countries under constant review taking account of current conditions and future prospects for the market concerned.

Financial Services Act

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what surveys have been made of the cost to firms of complying with the Financial Services Act.

Mr. Maude: The most significant survey has been the one commissioned by the Director General of Fair Trading into the impact of the new regulatory regime on independent advisers. Rigorous assessment of costs more generally has been complicated by the transitional arrangements provided for the introduction of various rules. The Director General has, however, indicated in his reports made under the Act that he intends to review the costs of compliance in a number of areas as part of his continuing responsibility for reviewing the effects on competition of the requirements introduced under the Act.

Film, Radio and Television Industry

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action or investigation his Department is undertaking to ensure that a thriving film, radio and television programme-making industry develops in the nations and regions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: Under the Films Act 1985 British Screen Finance Ltd. receives Government funds for investment in film production, and since January 1986 has supported 40 films. In addition, 30 projects have received Government finance under the development scheme managed by the National Film Development Fund.

Matters relating to radio and television programme making are primarily for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. However, my Department pursues a range of policies to encourage enterprise and an open and competitive economy, which apply to all industrial sectors, including those referred to by the hon. Member.

On 28 March 1988 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, together with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, referred questions as to possible restrictive labour practices in the film production, television and broadcasting industries to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, under the provisions of section 79 of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will express the volume of manufacturing output as an index with 1979 as 100 giving changes for each year since then; and what was the number of workers in manufacturing for each of these years.

Mr. Atkins: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Index of manufacturing output (1979 = 100)	All employees in manufacturing (000's)
1979	100·0	7,251
1980	91·3	6,935
1981	85·8	6,221
1982	86·0	5,863
1983	88·5	5,525
1984	92·1	5,409
1985	94·8	5,364
1986	95·0	5,235
1987	100·0	5,145

Manufacturing is defined as divisions 2 to 4 of the standard industrial classification.

The employment figures are June estimates for each year for Great Britain plus the average of each year's quarterly data for Northern Ireland.

Satellite Broadcasting

Miss Fookes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for what reasons his Department turned down the proposed use of the PAS-1 satellite by the C-SPAN network for the transmission of proceedings of the House of Lords on 4 July; when he expects to complete the review of his Department's policy towards C-SPAN's proposals to transmit coverage of the United States political conventions via Sky Channel; and what discussions his officials have had with British Telecom International concerning the necessary uplinks and downlinks for such transmissions.

Mr. Butcher: Article XIV of the INTELSAT agreement, to which the United Kingdom is a party, provides that private satellites may be used only after the INTELSAT assembly of parties has been appropriately consulted. Consultations on UK-US services using the PAS-1 satellite will not be completed until later this year. Nevertheless, Pan American Satellite submitted an application to the US Federal Communications Commission (FCC) for temporary authority for use of its satellite to transmit proceedings of the House of Lords. My Department and the US Department of State expressed doubts as to the legality of using the PAS-1 satellite in this way prior to INTELSAT assembly approval. The application was subsequently withdrawn.

A separate application has been made to the FCC for use of the satellite to transmit to the United Kingdom the proceedings of the US Republican and Democratic party conventions. This has not led to a change of views by either side, and I understand that the FCC has now been advised by the US Administration that the application for temporary authority should be denied on legal grounds.

British Telecom (BT) is the United Kingdom signatory to the INTELSAT operating agreement. BT made it clear that the company would have been prepared to provide the necessary facilities for these transmissions if the FCC had issued the necessary authority and United Kingdom obligations under the INTELSAT agreement could have been satisfied.

The Government support the development of private systems to compete with INTELSAT and at the forthcoming assembly of parties my officials will be actively seeking a favourable decision on use of the PAS-1 satellite.

Rover Group

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make it his policy to place in the Library a copy of the biannual report he intends to submit to the European Commissioner for competition, concerning the implementation of the Rover Group's corporate plan.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. I am not prepared to make available a confidential communication between the United Kingdom Government and the Commission containing commercially sensitive information about a company which will be in full private ownership.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has as to the evidence on which the European Commissioner for competition, Mr. Peter Sutherland, based his statement in the press release dated 13 July entitled "Commission reduces Aid to Rover", regarding the commitment in Rover's corporate plan to investment and restructuring costs of £1·5 billion and regarding the alleged plan by Rover to move from mass car to specialist production as a means of restraining growth in capacity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Member will be well aware of the Government's policy not to comment on commercial and financial details of Rover Group management's plans. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's question, I should point out that the Commission press release simply stated:

"The planned move by Rover from mass car producer to specialist producer will reduce the danger of aid being used to expand capacity."

Rover Group has of course, made public for some time its intention to follow an evolving product plan for the cars business to take it up-market.

TRANSPORT

Manchester Ship Canal Company

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the Manchester Ship Canal Company has applied for an order under the Harbours Act 1964 to change its company structure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The company has applied for a harbour revision order which would, among other things, empower it to redeem certain debentures held by the city of Manchester and end the right of the city council to appoint directors. Objections have been made to the application by certain interests, not including the city council, and if the matter cannot be resolved between the parties it will be necessary to hold a public inquiry as provided by the Harbours Act.

Heathrow Airport (Security)

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the organisation of the security procedures in the United Kingdom domestic flights section at terminal 1 at Heathrow airport, especially at busy periods, and about the implications for delays of the current non-utilisation of available equipment; what action he has taken as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received one approach about this. The question of how many X-ray machines and archway metal detectors are provided at airports, and how many are staffed and operational at any given time, is entirely a matter for the airport authorities and the airlines.

Bus Passenger Miles

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has of the bus passenger miles travelled in the metropolitan counties prior toderegulation and of the present figure.

Mr. David Mitchell: I regret that data on bus passenger miles in the metropolitan counties are not available. The latest information on passenger journeys is given on page 7 of the Department of Transport "Statistics Bulletin (88)29 (Bus and Coach Statistics Great Britain 1986/87"), a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans there are to aid the exporting ability of the Nottingham and the midlands region by the provision of rail freight facilities direct to the continent.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a matter for the British Railways Board, which is planning freight services through the Channel tunnel to and from a wide variety of destinations in the United Kingdom. Under section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987, it is required to publish a plan by 31 December 1989 setting out its proposals. It is consulting widely with interested parties in the regions during the preparation of this plan.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which routes will be used for the transport of goods for the continent coming from Nottingham via the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is an operational matter for the British Railways Board.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a White Paper concerning the impact of the building of the Channel tunnel upon each of the transport systems as they serve Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I see no need for a White Paper. As far as road services are concerned, the tunnel terminal will be connected direct to the M20, and there will be unbroken access by motorway to the M25 and so through to the M4 and other major routes. As far as rail services are concerned, British Rail is required under section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act to publish by the end of 1989 a plan setting out its proposals for international passenger and freight through services for the United Kingdom. The board will be consulting widely with interested parties in all parts of Britain, and has in the past two months held three regional seminars covering north, mid and south Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will commission a study of the likely impact upon the Crewe-Holyhead railway line of the Channel tunnel construction scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. This is a matter for the British Railways Board.

Road and Rail Services (Kent)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will examine the present major road and rail services in Kent, especially those connecting Kent towns with London, and consider their efficiency, effectiveness and quality in relation to road and rail services elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The national trunk road network is kept constantly under review. The national programme at present includes 15 major improvement schemes in Kent at various stages of preparation, collectively totalling some 73·5 miles and valued at £223 million (1985 prices). Other smaller but worthwhile schemes are in the regional programme.

We also support the county council's road building programme through the TSG system. In Kent's case we have undertaken to give sympathetic consideration to schemes made necessary by the Channel tunnel. The resources agreed in such cases are additional to those provided for in the county's normal programme.

As regards rail services, it is for British Rail to provide the appropriate level of service within the overall framework of objectives and quality standards that we have set it. The provision of bus services is for the bus operators and local authorities.

A20 (Delays)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has concerning delays experienced by motorists on the A20 southbound road at Sidcup road on Friday 8 July between 7 pm and 8 pm; and if he will make a statement about future improvements to, and maintenance of, this road.

Mr. Channon: Traffic out of London was reduced to one lane around the junction of A20 with A208 Court road from 7 pm on Friday 8 July in order to lay anti-skid surfacing as an accident prevention measure. The work had been postponed because of bad weather. The timing was agreed with the police.

Works on the A20 in Greenwich under consideration are: improvements to junctions with A208 Court road and B236 Green lane; closure of central reserve gaps in Sidcup road; erection of central reserve safety fence to connect with Sidcup bypass safety fence. Maintenance work is carried out as necessary.

A2/M2 (Delays)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has concerning delays experienced by motorists on the A2—M2 southbound carriageway on Friday 1 July between 11 pm and midnight; and if he will made a statement about future improvements to, and maintenance of, this road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I regret the delays. They were caused by accidents and by the subsequent removal of the contraflow system on completion of major maintenance work.

We have an extensive programme of maintenance on the A2/M2 over the next few years. Every effort is made to minimise delays to motorists.

Rail Services (London)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what estimates he has made of the cost of providing transport capacity in (i) the London Underground and (ii) the London overground system for an additional (a) 500,000 passengers, (b) 1 million passengers, (c) 1·5 million passengers and (d) 2 million passengers;

(2) what is the estimated cost of providing enough trains and staff for London Underground to run trains every three minutes at peak times.

Mr. David Mitchell: The cost and feasibility of improving the service operated on the current rail network and of providing additional capacity are matters which are being considered by the central London rail study announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 25 March. Intitial results are expected shortly, but further work will be needed before a full report can be prepared.

Cross-Channel Ferries

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list in the Official Report each occasion on which a cross-Channel ferry has applied to his Department for amendment to its passenger safety certificate in the last seven months; and on what grounds these applications were made;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report all crew specifications and crew/passenger ratios in regard to the issue of the passenger safety certificate amendments thereof.

Mr. David Mitchell: Excluding changes of ship's name, only one cross-Channel ferry passenger and safety certificate has been amended in the period; in May the lifesaving appliances on the ship in question were upgraded by replacing certain inflatable liferafts which were not fitted with launching devices with others launched by davit. The amendment did not relate to the crew or passenger numbers on the certificate.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what deviation from the specifications of the passenger safety certificate for a cross-Channel ferry are permitted before an application must be made for amendment to those specifications.

Mr. David Mitchell: Deviation from the regulations that contain the specifications for the construction and equipment of cross-Channel ferries is not permitted unless my Department is satisfied that the overall safety of the ships will not be thereby impaired. An application must be made for any exemption from the provisions of the regulations.

Light Aircraft Crash (Report)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight of 20 July 1987, Official Report, columns 41-42, when he expects the report of the Chief Inspector of Accidents on the crash of the Belgian light aircraft into the sea off the Isle of Wight on 30 April 1987 to be published.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: 22 August.

Shipping (Random Checks)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many random checks have been carried out by marine inspectors on all shipping vessels in the last 12 months, by category of vessel.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department's marine surveyors have carried out 1,173 inspections on United Kingdom ships and 2,262 on non-United Kingdom ships in the last 12 months.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Disabled People

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has for creating equality of opportunity for disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: It is one of the aims of this Government that disabled people should be given equality of opportunity in all fields. In the employment field, training courses, grants schemes and a sheltered placement scheme are operated, and local job markets provide a special placement service for the disabled. Advice and encouragement are given to all outside agencies which may also contribute towards providing equality of opportunity for disabled people.

WALES

Housing (Homeless Persons) Act

18. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to seek to repeal or amend the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act.

Mr. Grist: My right hon. Friend has no such plans at present.

Speech Therapy and Physiotherapy

15. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to satisfy himself that the non-educational needs of speech therapy and physiotherapy required by pupils in Wales with statements under section 7(1) of the Education Act 1981 are being adequately provided by district health authorities.

Mr. Grist: The number of speech therapists employed by health authorities in Wales has doubled since 1979 from 65 to 130, and the number of physiotherapists has increased by 38 per cent. from 382 to 528 over the same period. Through the manpower steering group the Welsh Office has asked health authorities to estimate how many speech therapists, physiotherapists (and other staff groups) will be required over the next five to 10 years. This should enable action to be taken where appropriate to meet these requirements.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, by county, the area of land designated as of outstanding natural beauty up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is as follows:

County	Designated areas in sq km
Up to 31 December 1978
Gwent	117
Gwynedd	370
West Glamorgan	189
From 1 January 1979 to 31 December 1987
Clwyd	156

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, by county, the sites designated as of special scientific interest, and the area of each, up to (a) 1979 and (b) 1987 in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The information is not readily available in the form requested and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost. I am arranging, however, to send the hon. Gentleman, and place in the Library of the House, lists of SSSI's in Wales as at 31 December 1987 showing the site area of each one.

Crown Classification Scheme

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the results of any consumer research regarding public understanding of the Crown classification scheme in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: A survey commissioned by the English tourist board in 1987 on public understanding of the Crown scheme covered Great Britain as a whole. I therefore refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment gave him on 12 July 1988, at column 196.

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department's expenditure on centrally controlled management or computer consultants if readily available only from 1984 onwards. The figures are as follows:

Financial Year	£
1984-85	93,654
1985-86	55,688
1986-87	27,927
1987-88	94,114

It is not possible to identify without disproportionate costs fees paid to outside consultants in respect of projects not centrally managed.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Peter Walker: The only centrally controlled management or computer consultancy contract extant in my Department at 1 January 1987 was with Ernst and Whinney for advising and assisting in the development of computer auditing. It is not possible to identify without disproportionate costs management or computer consultancy contracts extant at 1 January 1987 in respect of projects not centrally managed.

Farming Unions

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what further initiatives have been taken by his Department to promote unity of the farming unions in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: My Department is providing both unions with such information and other assistance as they may find useful in their current exploratory discussions aimed at greater unity.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on initiatives taken by the Farmers Union of Wales and the National Farmers Union in Wales, respectively, in the current year to promote unity; and what measures are being proposed.

Mr. Peter Walker: I understand that their discussions aimed at establishing closer links between the two bodies are continuing.

Farming Industry

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) farmers and (b) farm workers were employed in each county in Wales in June.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information for June 1988 is not yet available.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what monitoring of the provision of services for mentally handicapped people is taking place in Wales in line with Her Majesty's Government's response to the second report of the Social Services Committee of Session 1984-85.

Mr. Grist: In addition to those arrangements for monitoring in Wales outlined in my reply to the hon. Gentleman on 14 July 1988, the Department maintains regular contact with county joint planning teams, and its social work services division is empowered to examine all aspects of personal social services provision for people with a mental handicap in private, voluntary and public sectors.

Housing Capital Allocations

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations have been received from Preseli Pembrokeshire and South Pembrokeshire district councils concerning their housing capital allocations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Grist: The Department has received no representations from South Pembrokeshire district council. Preseli Pembrokeshire district council has undertaken an evaluation of its outstanding housing problems identified by our 1986 Welsh house condition survey. The Department is considering this and the associated resource implications which will we understand form part of the authority's future housing strategy and investment programme.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the housing capital allocations made to each Welsh local authority for 1988-89 together with the amount actually allocated for the present financial year with the percentage of the total applications and allocations each figure represents.

Mr. Grist: Information relating to capital allocations issued to date in the current financial year (1988-89) is given in the following table.

Local authorities provide statements of the total size of housing investment programmes they would like to undertake. They do not bid specifically for their main housing capital allocations which are largely formula based and are only a part of the resources available to carry out their programme.

	Housing capital allocations issued to date current year (1988-89) £000s	Individual local authority housing capital allocation as per cent. of amount allocatable

Welsh Language

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales to what extent computers are being used in schools in Wales which teach through the medium of the Welsh language; if he will list those schools in the Official Report; and what proposals he has to finance the making of programmes required in these schools, which would be additional to those from local education authority sources.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A recent HMI survey, to be published on 18 July, considers the use of computers in Welsh-medium learning in primary and secondary schools in Wales. Copies will be placed in the Library of the House shortly. An associated survey established that all secondary schools and the great majority of primary schools use computers.

Detailed information for individual schools is not currently available, but the Welsh Office is presently carrying out a survey of the use of computers in all schools in Wales. Results will be available later this year.

The Welsh Office has provided support under section 21 of the Education Act 1980 for the production of Welsh-medium software. For 1989-90 applications for grant for this purpose will be co-ordinated by the Micro-Electronics Unit (Wales) to ensure that all local education authorities benefit from the developments. The Micro-Electronics Unit (Wales), which was set up with funding from the eight local education authorities and Welsh Office, also produces software in both Welsh and English.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Hurd: The Home Office spent approximately £879,000 on management and computer consultants for 1984-85. Equivalent estimated payments for 1985-86, 1986-87 and for the calendar year 1987 were £1,495,000, £2,665,000 and £3,316,000 respectively. These payments include expenses and VAT as well as fees. Information for the years before 1984-85 is not readily available.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Hurd The following management or computer consultancy contracts awarded by the Home Office were extant on 1 January 1987:

Firm	Subject of the assignment
Craton Lodge and Knight Company Ltd.	Assistance with marketing strategy for the Prison Service Industries and Farms
Deloitte Haskins and Sells	Development of a financial management information system for the Probation Service
Professor Samuel Eilon	The development of an evaluation methodology for the Police National Computer Project
Ernst Whinney	Support for automatic finger-printing recognition planning
Express Computer	Financial Management Systems—technical support
Express Computer	Finance Division 1—Performance Study
Fraser Williams	Bootle Bureau Computer—technical support
Doctor Hyatt-Williams	Post-shooting trauma study
International Computers Ltd.	Private Office correspondence—technical support
KMG Thomson McLintock	Office Automation Study
PA Computers and Telecoms	Study of network migration to the Police National Computer
PA Computers and Telecoms	Future development of computer systems in Magistrates Courts
PA Management Consultants	Assist with implementation of "Fresh Start" to the Prison Service
RIPA Consultancy Services	Probation Information Services—technical support
Smith Associates	An analysis of the likely costs and benefits of introducing a mobile data terminal system in police vehicles
Software Sciences	Immigration Service—technical support
Sound Techniques	Evaluation of the use of computers in Magistrates Courts
Systems Designers Scientific	A review of emergency communications service
Touche Ross	Study on scientific support for the police service in England and Wales
White Waghorn	Computerisation of Scientific Research and Development Branch accountancy system
White Waghorn	Financial Management System—technical support

Industry Watch

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the initial impact of Industry Watch in combating crime and vandalism on industrial estates.

Mr. John Patten: Industry watch enables the police, local business and industry and, in some instances, the local authority, to bring their expertise and resources together to introduce measures to prevent crime in industrial areas. Comprehensive information about every industry watch scheme is not held centrally, but we are aware of a number of successful schemes in different parts of the country, including the excellent one at the North Lynn industrial estate in my hon. Friend's constituency. I understand from the chief constable of Norfolk that in the first 12 months from the scheme's introduction in March 1987, no crimes were recorded on the estate by the police. The local crime prevention officer concerned with this scheme is in touch with other police forces interested in establishing industry watch schemes in their areas based on this excellent model.

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of petitions sent to his Department by inmates in prison in England and Wales in each of the last three years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
1985	14,323
1986	15,528
1987	14,580

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's policy on the transfer of foreign nationals serving prison sentences in prisons in the United Kingdom to their own country to serve their sentences; how often this has taken place in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom is a party to the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons, together with 11 other member states and Finland, Canada and the United States of America. We would normally agree to transfer under the convention unless that would result in significantly earlier release than would have been possible in the United Kingdom, or there are compelling reasons of public policy for refusal. No petitions for transfer from the United Kingdom have so far been refused.

The convention came into force in the United Kingdom on 1 August 1985. Eleven prisoners were transferred in the year ended 31 July 1986, six in the year ended 31 July 1987, and 10 in the 11 months ended 30 June 1988.

Prisons (Overcrowding)

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further steps the Government plan to take to reduce the problem of overcrowding in prisons and remand centres.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are implementing the programme of measures to produce additional prison places in the short term announced by my right hon. Friend on 30 March. Two new prisons will open in August and September this year, and two temporary prisons will open later in the autumn. Together, these establishments will add about 1,800 places. Capacity at existing establishments will be increased by some 800 places before the end of the current financial year by the installation of secure prefabricated accommodation. A further 1,000 places will be provided in purpose-built blocks at existing establishments around the end of 1989. Taken together, these measures will provide over 3,500 extra places by the end of the next financial year. At the same time, the capacity of many establishments is being increased by smaller scale building works and the injection of additional resources.

Computer Work Stations

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many computer work stations there are in his Department; what is the ratio of work stations to civil servants; and how he expects this to change over the next five years.

Mr. Hurd: At present there are some 2,100 computer work stations in the Department. This represents about one terminal for every 18 staff in post or, excluding the prison service, which accounts for some two thirds of the Department's complement, one for every six staff. "Work station" is here taken to include linked terminals and "stand-alone" microcomputers, but to exclude portable text processors. These figures are likely to increase substantially over the next five years but it is difficult to predict by what factor.

Information Technology

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the composition of the senior information technology strategy committee in his Department; and how many times in the past year its meetings have been attended by Ministers.

Mr. Hurd: The senior information technology strategy committee in the Home Office is the Home Office information technology committee, which has the following membership:

Principal Establishment Officer (Chairman) (grade 2).
Principal Finance Officer (grade 3).
Heads of senior representatives of most of the functional departments, mainly at grade 3 level.
Head of Research and Planning Unit.
Head of IT Division.
Head of Computing and Pay Services.
A senior representative of the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, HM Treasury.

The committee is composed of officials, and Ministers do not attend its meetings: other means exist of bringing information technology matters to ministerial attention.

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the staff in his Department at grades 1, 2 and 3 have attended courses or training on information technology awareness or management in the last 12 months.

Mr. Hurd: In the past 12 months, two under secretaries (grade 3) have attended management tutorials in information technology. A deputy secretary (grade 2) and an under secretary have attended general management courses which included sessions on information technology. Other members of staff in the grades in question have attended presentations on specific subjects relating to information technology.

Gloucester (Law and Order)

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Gloucestershire regarding the law and order situation in the Barton street area of Gloucester; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will meet urgently the chief constable of Gloucestershire to discuss the law and order situation in the Barton street area of Gloucester.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have recently received a report from the chief constable on the policing of the Barton street area of Gloucester about which my right hon. Friend wrote to my hon. Friend on 5 July. He has no current plans to meet the chief constable.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will pay an official visit to the Barton street area of Gloucester to view the law and order position there: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the level of policing in force in the Barton street area of Gloucester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have received representations from my hon. Friend.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet a delegation of residents from the Barton street area of Gloucester to discuss the breakdown of public order there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Responsibility for operational decisions on policing the Barton street area are for the chief constable of Gloucestershire and it would not be right to intervene. The chief constable is committed to the effective policing of the area and I understand from him that resources are devoted to it and to other parts of the county commensurate with his duty to maintain the peace and to enforce the law throughout Gloucestershire.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will commit additional resources to the Gloucestershire constabulary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No application for an increase in the police establishment has been received from the police authority. Any such application would be considered along with those from other authorities, in the light of advice from Her Majesty's inspectorate and within the limits of the extra posts available.

Passports

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what extra resources of people or equipment would be necessary to bring down the waiting time for a passport from the Glasgow office to 14 days; and if he has any plans to provide these resources;

(2) what is the policy of his Department regarding a satisfactory waiting time for the issue of a straightforward, non-urgent passport.

Mr. Renton: Non-urgent applications posted to the Glasgow passport office are now being processed within 11 working days, and those lodged in person within four working days. This improvement in the service has been achieved mainly as a result of the additional staff allocated to the office earlier this year, referred to in my reply to a recent question from the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie).

Passport application forms advise applicants to allow at least a month for non-urgent postal applications. Urgent applications are given priority. Our aim, once the computerisation programme has been completed in all passport offices, is to process applications in much less than a month.

Local Radio

Mr. Sayeed to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, when he next meets the chairman of the BBC, he will raise with him the implications of the corporation's plans to reduce the funding of existing local radio stations for the Government's commitment to an increase in the quantity and quality of local radio provision.

Mr. Renton: No. I have to tell my hon. Friend that I have already made it clear on a number of occasions that it is for the BBC to decide for itself how much of its resources to commit to local radio.

Turkish President (Visit)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to what instructions were given to police officers on the occasion of the arrival of General Evren on 13 July concerning the distribution of leaflets and holding of placards by the public.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that officers were given no specific instructions about the distribution of leaflets. They were however instructed to move demonstrators who were carrying banners and placards, whether they were in support of or against the visit, to separate, pre-selected locations in order to prevent an outbreak of disorder between the opposing factions. Once at such locations, banners and placards were permitted to be displayed.

Football Matches (Offences)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were arrested, how many charged and how many convicted following offences committed inside English Football League grounds during the 1987-88 football season.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There were 6,147 arrests at Football League matches in England and Wales during the 1987-88 season. Details of charges and convictions arising from offences at football matches are not held centrally.

Immigration (Members' Representations)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is now in a position to report the outcome of his review of hon. Members' representations in immigration cases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Yes. The review, which I announced on 16 November has now been completed. I have today placed in the Library a copy of revised draft guidelines for handling these representations and my hon. Friend the Minister of State is writing to all Members enclosing a copy of the draft guidelines. There will be an opportunity to debate the draft guidelines before their introduction, which we hope will be around the end of the year.

Separate but similar draft guidelines are also being issued today by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in connection with Members' representations about the operation of the immigration control overseas.

Offenders (Punishment)

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish proposals for punishing more offenders in the community.

Mr. Hogg: I have today published a Green Paper, "Punishment, Custody and the Community" (Cm. 424). It describes the policies we shall be pursuing in the next year and puts forward proposals for future changes. We would welcome comments on these ideas.

Prisoners

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will state for each of the last 24 months (i) the number of category A, B, C and D prisoners in prisons on the last day of each month, and (ii) the number of category A, B and C prisoners who had (a) been accepted, and (b) been released, during that month;

(2) if he will list for each prison in the United Kingdom, for each of the last 24 months, the number of category A, B, C and D prisoners.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 6 July 1988]: The information readily available centrally is given in the following tables. Further figures could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Diplomatic Service

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what body is responsible for recruitment into the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service; and what procedures are set for such recruitment.

Mrs. Chalker: The Civil Service commissioners are responsible for the recruitment to the administrative grades of the Diplomatic Service. The procedures are the same as for entry into "fast stream" posts in Home Civil Service. Applicants who pass an initial written qualifying test undergo a two-day series of tests, group exercises and interviews at the Civil Service selection board (CSSB). Candidates who perform sufficiently well at CSSB are invited to attend a final selection board (FSB), which is chaired by a Civil Service commissioner and normally includes one or more representatives of the Diplomatic Service. Candidates for the Diplomatic Service take a language aptitude test before attending the FSB.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects a graduate from a polytechnic to be recruited into the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service.

Mrs. Chalker: As soon as a graduate from a polytechnic is successful in the selection process undertaken by all candidates. The Civil Service commissioners and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have gone to considerable lengths in recent years to encourage students in all institutions of higher education to apply for "fast stream" posts in both the Diplomatic Service and the Home Civil Service.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what qualities are expected from applicants recruited into the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service.

Mrs. Chalker: They are expected to combine good basic intellectual skills with strong personal qualities. Applicants must be adaptable and physically and mentally resilient; in the course of a career they will have to produce high quality work in conditions that may be unpleasant or dangerous. They should have the ability to communicate well both orally and in writing and show potential for assuming managerial responsibilities.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many members of the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service were serving in his Department in each of the years 1978 to 1987, inclusive.

Mrs. Chalker: The Department's computerised records do not distinguish between administrative and executive group staff in all cases. The approximate figures are as follows:

	Number
1978	857
1979	847
1980	807
1981	789
1982	780
1983	776
1984	785
1985	781
1986	784
1987	779

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what methods are used to make known the procedures for entrance into the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service and the designation and job descriptions of posts which become vacant in the service.

Mrs. Chalker: All Diplomatic Service entry competitions are advertised in the national press. Additionally, each year the Civil Service Commission sends all careers advisers in universities, polytechnics and colleges of higher education details of forthcoming schemes and copies of the competion regulations. These include details of the selection procedures involved. Each applicant for the competition is provided with a copy of these recruitment regulations. The procedures are also made known through a range of careers booklets and publicity distributed to universities and polytechnics by the Civil Service Commission and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and through briefing talks given to university and polytechnic students.

Lists of posts likely to fall vacant in a particular grade over a 12-month period are circulated annually to all Diplomatic Service mainstream grades up to grade 4. Officers are invited to fill in a form indicating their preferences. Details of specific jobs to which an officer might be considered and officers' career plans are discussed by officers and personnel managers.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applicants for posts in the administrative group of the Diplomatic Service in each of the years 1985 to 1987, inclusive, were (a) male and (b) female; and what percentage in each case was successful.

Mrs. Chalker: The figures were:

	Applicants		Percentage successful
Year	Male	Female	Male	Female
1985	1,206	774	1·5	1·3
1986	1,220	859	1·4	1·3
1987	1,383	964	1·9	0·9

Khmer Rouge

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is proposing to review Her Majesty's Government's support at the United Nations for the Khmer Rouge and its allies in the light of Prince Sihanouk's resignation.

Mr. Mellor: Her Majesty's Government do not support the Khmer Rouge. The United Nations General Assembly has not voted on the credentials of the representatives of Democratic Kampuchea since 1982. If there is a vote at the next session we shall consider our position in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the grades of staff and numbers in each grade in his Department.

Mrs. Chalker: The list of grades in the diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is:

Diplomatic Service Grades
Senior Grades
Grades 4 to 10
Legal Advisers
Secretarial Grades 1-3c
Security Officer Grades
Queen's Messengers
Technical and Communication Grades

Home Civil Service Grades
Grades 1A to 7

Numbers in each grade fluctuate from month to month, in accordance with operational requirements and the rates of retirements, resignations, recruitment, inward and outward transfers and secondments, and promotions. The information requested for all grades employed in the FCO is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Arrested Britons (Majorca)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a consular officer will next pay a visit to the five Britons arrested in Majorca on 1 July; and what advice was offered by the officer on his last visit.

Mr. Mellor: The persons concerned were conditionally released on 14 July 1988. The charges against them still stand.

During his last visit to them, prior to their release Her Majesty's consul at Palma sought to confirm their wellbeing. He did not offer any specific advice, as it is for their Spanish lawyer to provide any advice which they might require about their cases.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for the preservation of historic buildings in Jamestown and elsewhere on St. Helena.

Mr. Mellor: None, although it has always been our policy to liaise closely with the St. Helena Government over the need to preserve historic buildings on St. Helena.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the cost to his Department of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The cost to my Department of employing management or computer consultants was as follows:

	£ Thousands
1984-85	328,518
1985-86	502,181
1986-87	580,371
1987-88	662,156

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The management or computer consultancy contracts extant in my Department as at 1 January 1987 were as follows:

Firm	Subject of assignment
Coopers and Lybrand	Regional Review
Computer Sciences	Review of Agricultural Census data processing
IBM United Kingdom	Systems engineering support
P A Consultants	Strategy study on integrated management information systems
Sequel Information	Review of Agricultural Census data processing
Touche Ross	Dairy Crest foods
Touche Ross	MAFF/Milk Marketing Board agency agreement on milk quotas
Wootton Jeffries	Development of IBAP butter stocks system

Food Labelling

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to require all food to bear full ingredient and nutritional labelling.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Food Labelling Regulations 1984 implement European Community directive 79/112 and already require most pre-packaged foods to carry a list of ingredients. The exemptions are Community based, but I anticipate that the European Commission may make proposals to remove some of them such as for alcoholic drinks. I have issued guidelines to industry suggesting the information and format that should be given for the nutrition labelling of foods; I expect that the European Commission will make proposals for a Community regime in this area shortly.

Food Additives

Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to prohibit the addition of unnecessary substances to food and the use of unnecessary processes.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Independent expert advisory committees provide advice to Ministers on the use of substances throughout the food chain. The Food Act 1984 makes an offence the addition of any substances to food or the use of any process on food which will render the food injurious to health. Furthermore, in the exercise of regulation-making powers on the composition of food, Ministers are required by the Act to restrict as far as practicable the use of substances of no nutritional value.

Brewery Tenants

Miss Lestor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received regarding the Brewers Society code of practice on tenant security; and what action his Department will take in response to these representations.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) on 14 June, at column 135.

Farming Industry

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) farmers and (b) farmworkers were employed in each county in England in June.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I regret that information for June 1988 is not yet available. The latest information, taken from the June 1987 census, on the numbers of farmers and workers by county in England is as follows:

ENVIRONMENT

Spandau Prison

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what extra amounts were paid out on the contracts for the demolition of Spandau prison over and above the agreed tender price;

(2) what is the current position on the contract for the demolition of Spandau prison; what was the outturn time period and the outturn price; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what was the total amount of the successful tender for the demolition of Spandau prison; and what was the time period quoted in the tender.

Mr. Chope: The amount of the successful tender was DM1,696,286 and the contract period was two months. The work took six and a half weeks and was completed on 4 November 1987. The outturn cost was DM1,658,963 and the final account was settled on 19 November. No extra amounts were paid on the one contract. The full cost was met by the German Federal Government.

Gas and Electricity Meters

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the installation in accessible places of gas and electricity meters for easy reading in all new housing developments.

Mrs. Roe: The siting of electricity and gas meters in new housing developments is a matter for developers and their agents to agree with their local supply authorities.

Bonamy Estate, Southwark

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the dates of (i) all meetings since 25 February 1983 between officials of his Department and officers of the London borough of Southwark to discuss the Bonamy estate and (ii) all correspondence (a) from his Department to the London borough of Southwark and (b) from the London borough of Southwark to his Department in relation to the Bonamy estate; if he will list all moneys granted by his Department to the London borough of Southwark for expenditure on the Bonamy estate; if he will list all expenditure approved by his Department and all permission to spend approved by Department in relation to the Bonamy estate; and if he will publish all relevant correspondence.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since 25 February 1983 meetings have taken place on 13 July 1983, 13 September 1983, 9 March 1984, 28 August 1984, 15 November 1984, 26 August 1985, 9 May 1985, 21 August 1985, 25 February 1986 and 4 November 1986.

Since 25 February 1983 capital expenditure of £0·3 million has been approved (30 September 1985) with eligibility for subsidy at 75 per cent. of the loan charges.

Other than housing subsidy, no Exchequer grants have been paid.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has no plans to publish the correspondence about the Bonamy estate.

Homelessness

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have received extra housing investment programme allocations in 1988-89, to provide additional accommodation for the homeless, under the initiative he announced on 17 June; what additional housing investment allocation each local authority has received under this initiative; how many units of accommodation each local authority has estimated will result, comprising (a) local authority dwellings refurbished, (b) hostel places provided by local authorities, (c) hostel places provided by housing associations and (d) other dwellings or places provided by local authorities; and how quickly these units are expected to become available.

Mrs. Roe: Local authorities estimate that the additional allocation of £21·1 million we have given them following our announcement in June will provide nearly 1,900 extra units of accommodation for the benefit of homeless people. These units should be available in the current financial year. The further details requested are set down in the table.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he used in selecting (a) which schemes should be approved for additional housing investment programme allocations, (b) which local authorities should receive additional housing investment programme allocations and (c) what extra housing investment programme allocations each local authority should receive under the initiative he announced on 17 June, to provide additional accommodation for the homeless.

Mrs. Roe: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 23 June, at columns 705-6.

Rating Reform

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will estimate the approximate expenditure per head for each of the local authority functions or responsibilities that is consistent with a standard level of service that arises from a community charge of £202 for each community charge payer;

(2) whether he will estimate the performance criteria for each of the major local authority functions or responsibilities that allowed him to arrive at a standard level of service that arises from a community charge of £202 for each community charge payer.

Mr. Howard: The standard level of service associated with the estimated community charge for spending at need of £202 in 1988-89 is the grant related expenditure assessment for each local authority in 1988-89. Details of the construction of these assessments are given in the DOE publication "Grant Related Expenditure 1988-89—How the expenditure needs of local authorities are assessed for block grant." The actual assessments for individual services for each local authority are given in the related DOE publication, "The Technical Handbook of Grant Related Expenditure 1988-89." Copies of these publications are available in the Library.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the difference in cost as expressed in the Price Waterhouse report between operating the existing rating system for five years and implementing and operating the community charge for five years.

Mr. Howard: At constant prices the collection costs for rates for five years would be about £1 billion and the cost of collecting the community charge would be between £1·8 and £2·1 billion. The increase in collection costs needs to be viewed against the fact that every 1 per cent. reduction in local government expenditure secured from the discipline of the new arrangements would yield savings of £500 million a year.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he will make in respect of poll tax liability of single members of the armed forces living on a military base but remaining on the electoral register at the parental home.

Mr. Howard: Members of the United Kingdom armed forces will pay the personal community charge to the local authority in whose area they have their sole or main residence, with the exception of those who have their sole or main residence in buildings designated under paragraph 11 of schedule 1 to the Local Government Finance Bill. In that case, they will instead make a payment to the Government, which will pay contributions in aid of community charges to the local authorities concerned.

Annunciator Monitors

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the screen sizes of the five annunciator monitors purchased in 1986.

Mr. Chope: Twenty inches.

Prospect Estate

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, subsequent to meeting a delegation from the borough of Rushmoor on 26 May, he has accepted its case for subsidy, for the current and subsequent financial years, to nullify the effects of the abolition of project control in the matter of major technical repairs on the Prospect estate.

Mrs. Roe: I will inform the council as soon as I have reached a decision on its application for a special determination for subsidy, and I will inform the hon. Member at the same time.

Warrington and Runcorn (Rented Property)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 7 July, if he will now provide the information requested concerning the identity of those to whom he sent copies of letters relating to decisions on the transfer of management of rented property belonging to Warrington and Runcorn development corporation; why that information was not provided in the answer of 7 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe: The Secretary of State has no role in the decision of the Warrington and Runcorn development corporation for the interim management of the new town rented housing in Warrington. No decision letter on management has therefore been issued by my Department.

Self-build Housing Associations

Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those self-build housing associations which have received financial assistance from the Government for projects in the inner cities during the past five years, showing under what programme this was given and to what value.

Mrs. Roe: The following self-build housing associations have each received £1,000 loan finance under the Housing Corporation's approved development programme and guarantees from the corporation in respect of additional borrowings:

Associations	Total scheme cost to date (£)
Riverside	758,000
Glengall	485,000
Zenzele	127,056
Woolwell	636,378
Roborough	632,040
Fosse	232,000
Dingle Mount	480,000
Seaton Carew	576,147
Baytree	593,000
Bolton Lodge[1]	—

[1] £290,923 of the loan advanced on this scheme was written-off by the Corporation and the scheme transferred to the North British Housing Association as a fair rent scheme.

In addition, my Department provided £28,615 to the Self Help Community Housing Association under the urban programme.

Leeds Housing Action Trust

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in what form the Leeds city council was consulted at any stage leading up to the announcement of the Leeds housing action trust.

Mrs. Roe: Leeds city council, like all local authorities in England, was sent a copy of the Department's consultation document on housing action trusts published in October 1987. The council responded on 30 October 1987 and a copy of its response was placed in the Library.

Following the announcement about housing action trusts on 11 July, my right hon. Friend wrote to the leader of the Leeds city council the same day inviting the council and representatives of tenant groups to a meeting to discuss his proposals for a housing action trust in Leeds.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the criteria for choosing the particular 7,123 houses comprising the proposed Leeds housing action trust.

Mrs. Roe: In choosing the areas which might be covered by housing action trusts, my right hon. Friend has taken account of the matters listed in clause 60(5) of the Housing Bill.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last paid an official visit to Leeds, in particular South Seacroft, Gipton and Halton Moor areas.

Mrs. Roe: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning saw each of these areas when he made an official visit to Leeds last September.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has of the wishes of the tenants of the Gipton, Seacroft and Halton Moor estates proposed for a housing action trust; and what steps he has taken to consult the tenants directly.

Mrs. Roe: My right hon. Friend wrote to the leader of the Leeds city council on 11 July inviting the councils and representatives of tenant groups to a meeting to discuss his proposals for a housing action trust in Leeds. In addition, he has written to all residents in the Halton Moor, Seacroft South and Gipton estates who might be affected by the established of a housing action trust.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department has done an analysis of the voids and rent arrears in the estates of Gipton, Halton and South Seacroft, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe: The Department receives a copy of Leeds city council's quarterly review of statistics about housing estates in Leeds, including information about voids and rent arrears.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information was available to him about the renovation programmes that have recently taken place to the housing stock in Gipton, South Seacroft and Halton estates in Leeds before he made his announcement of 11 July on the designation of housing action trusts.

Mrs. Roe: The council provides information about its renovation programme for these and other estates as part of its housing investment programme submission to the Department. Additional information has also been made available in support of bids for additional allocations under the estate action programme.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he had before 11 July about the progress of the priority estates programme scheme initiated in conjunction with his Department in the area now designated as a housing action trust.

Mrs. Roe: There is no departmental priority estate project in the area now proposed as a housing action trust. Leeds city council, however, has itself designated certain areas, including one at South Seacroft, as priority estates. Information about progress at South Seacroft was included in the council's 1987 housing investment programme strategy statement. In addition, the Department has information on progress on estate action projects at South Girton and Halton Moor.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of (a) the recent housing investment programme resources in the area comprising the Leeds housing action trust and (b) his Department's estimates of the amount needed to bring the housing stock in the Leeds housing action trust up to current day housing standards.

Mrs. Roe: It is for Leeds city council to determine how much of its housing investment programme resources should be allocated to individual estates and programmes. Through estate action we have provided additional housing investment and urban programme resources totalling £2·1 million since 1986-87 in the area which might be covered by a housing action trust.

Decisions on the precise areas which might be designated will be taken in the light of consultants' studies and of local views. It will be for the housing action trust, if established, to consider its proposals for the area, in consultation with the local authority and local people.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish figures for the tenancy turnover in Gipton, South Seacroft and Halton Moor council estates, Leeds.

Mrs. Roe: Leeds city council publishes a quarterly review of statistics which contains information about lettings on its individual estates.

Single Market

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether initiatives leading to the single European Community market by 1992 will involve and include harmonisation of member countries' limits of liability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: In July 1987, the European Commission, as part of an initiative to explore further areas of harmonisation in the construction industry, commissioned a study of liability, indemnity and insurance arrangements in the members states. A draft report will be available shortly. We are keeping representatives of the construction industry and its clients informed of developments.

Limehouse Link

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether there will be a public inquiry into the compulsory purchase orders required for the Limehouse link.

Mr. Trippier: A public inquiry into the London Docklands Development Corporation (Limehouse Link, Tower Hamlets) Compulsory Purchase Order 1988 is being arranged. The decision not to call in the planning application in respect of the Limehouse link road proposal was taken after consideration of all relevant matters and of all representations made to the planning authority and to my Department. The Limehouse link would not be a trunk road, but would be a distribution road within docklands, constructed and owned by the LDDC.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who was consulted in the latest announcement not to call a public inquiry into the Limehouse link.

Mr. Trippier: The decision not to call in the planning application in respect of the Limehouse link road proposal was taken after consideration of all relevant matters and of all representations made to the planning authority and to my Department.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Limehouse link will form part of a trunk road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: No. The Limehouse link and other distributor roads within docklands will be constructed and owned by the LDDC.

Self Builders

Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Housing Corporation has any plans to revise its lending policy to self builders.

Mrs. Roe: The Housing Corporation is currently reviewing the position on self build housing associations and will submit any proposals for change to my Department in due course.

Non-domestic Rates

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each rating authority (a) the non-domestic rate poundage for 1988-89 and (b) the amount to be received from non-domestic rates in 1988-89.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed in the Library a table containing the requested information. The estimated non-domestic rate yield was calculated by multiplying each poundage by the non-domestic rateable value in that area.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, assuming the implementation of the proposals in the Local Government Finance Bill, he will list what each local authority would have received from the national non-domestic rate pool in 1988-89 based on a national non-domestic rate poundage of 239·5p.

Mr. Ridley: Non-domestic rates are expected to yield about £8·9 billion in 1988-89. Under the proposals contained in the Local Government Finance Bill this would be distributed to local authorities as £245 per adult.

Local Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the information he has collected on the accumulated capital receipts held by local authorities at the end of March 1988.

Mr. Ridley: This information is not yet available.

Salmon Fishing (Rates)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate, by local authority area, the loss of non-domestic rates revenue from salmon fishing resulting from Government amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary to my right hon.Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) on 7 March 1988, at column 78.

Central Manchester Development Corporation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the directors of the Manchester urban development corporation, their remuneration and details of any elected office they have held or hold.

Mr. Trippier: The membership and annual remuneration of the board of the Central Manchester development corporation is as follows:

Chairman: Dr. James Grigor (£14,223).
Deputy Chairman: Mr. Derek Boothman (£6,436).
Members: Mr. Ken Alford, Mrs. Deborah Buchanan, Mr. John Collins, Councillor Jack Flanagan, Mr. Raymond Gerrard, Councillor Mrs. Joyce Hill, Mr. Bob Scott, Councillor Graham Stringer (each £3,770).

The three councillors are members of Manchester city council. No other board members currently hold elected office.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of job vacancies in Cumbria; and what measures are being taken to ease any skills shortage.

Mr. Nicholls: There were 2,019 unfilled vacancies, excluding community programme vacancies, registered at jobcentres in the county of Cumbria in May 1988, the latest date for which figures are available. It is estimated, nationally, that about one third of all vacancies are notified to jobcentres.

The existence of unfilled vacancies should not necessarily be taken as evidence of skill shortages; some vacancies will remain unfilled for other reasons while some arise as a result of job-changing and will be essentially of a short-term nature.

It is primarily for employers to supply the skills they need by providing the proper incentives and by making the necessary investment in training.

The Government have given a lead by more than doubling their own investment in vocational education and training since 1979, especially through the two-years YTS for school leavers and employment training—the £1·4 billion training programme for unemployed adults. The Training Commission monitors skill supply and demand at national and local levels to inform employers and assist in the planning and targeting of government training programmes.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the representations he has received on the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations.

Mr. Nicholls: Following extensive consultation, the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission has submitted proposals to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on regulations for the control of substances hazardous to health. My right hon. Friend has received no other representations on this subject.

Special Steels Ltd. (Sheffield)

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on which dates in each of the last five years Health and Safety Executive inspectors visited the factory of Special Steels Limited, Bacon Lane, Sheffield; if, for each such visit he will summarise the action taken by the executive; how many notified or reported accidents or dangerous occurrences have occurred at the factory in each of the last five years; and for each such notified or reported accident what action was taken by the Health and Safety Executive on receipt of the notification or report.

Mr. Nicholls: Inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) have made three visits to Special Steels Limited, Bacon Lane, Sheffield during the last five years.

On 30 April 1985, HSE inspectors carried out an accident investigation and afterwards sent a letter to the company. On 20 March 1987, inspectors made a preventive inspection visit followed by verbal advice. On 24 June 1988 a visit was made to investigate a fatal accident and a prohibition notice was issued.

No other accidents or incidents have been reported to HSE during the last five years.

Employment Training Scheme

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will review the remuneration to be made available to trainees taking up places on the employment training scheme.

Mr. Nicholls: No. The level of training allowances on employment training have been set to ensure that all trainees will be better off on the programme than remaining unemployed and on benefit. In addition, trainees will be reimbursed all fares over £5 per week and paid lodging costs for training away from home. There will be assistance with the cost of any special clothing needed and lone parents will receive child care costs of up to £50 per week for each child. Trainees who successfully complete their training plan will also receive a training bonus of up to £200, depending on their level of achievement.

All these allowances will be free from deductions for income tax and national insurance contributions and all trainees entitled to income support will retain their passport to other social security benefits. This is a substantial package which should provide an incentive to all unemployed people to take advantage of the high-quality training on offer.

Companies (Employee Involvement)

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further conclusions he has drawn from more recent employee involvement statements in company directors' reports in accordance with section 235 and schedule 7 of part V of the Companies Act 1985.

Mr. Nicholls: I have today placed a survey of a sample of recent reports in the Library of the House. It shows a continuing improvement in the reporting of employee involvement practices.

Tourism

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the arrangements for Government support for the tourism industry.

Mr. Fowler: The tourism industry is now one of Britain's largest and fastest growing industries. In 1987, a record 15·4 million visits were paid to the United Kingdom from overseas. The total turnover of the industry was some £18 billion. A total of 1·4 million people work in the main tourism-related sectors. An additional 41,000 jobs were created in the year to December 1987, and turnover rose by some 5 per cent.

The importance of tourism is now more widely understood than it was a few years ago. That, in large part, is due to the efforts of the industry itself. It is also due to the work of the English tourist board, the other national tourist boards, and the British Tourist Authority, and to the work of Government in supporting the industry, described in a series of publications of which "Tourism '88" published in May, is the fourth.

Given the degree of interest there now is in tourism, the degree of support for it, and the changing nature of the industry, the time is right for the Government to look at their policies to see that they are as relevant as possible to the current situation. I am therefore setting in hand a review of the role of Government—in particular of my own Department—in relation to the tourism industry, which I expect to be completed by the end of this year.

The Government continues to recognise the importance of the industry, and remains committed to providing the economic and regulatory framework within which the industry can prosper. The levels of funding by my Department; the mechanisms by which these funds are applied; and the implications for the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board and their activities will obviously have to be considered by the review against the background of the wider role of Government and their wish to see such activities carried out in the private sector wherever possible. The review will also clearly need to consider the cost-effectiveness of this funding in a climate where continued expansion of jobs and business is anticipated.

My right hon. Friends in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have their own arrangements for tourism and the review will not be looking at these and how they apply to their national tourist boards, although clearly my right hon. Friends will be interested in the outcome of the review.

I have also consulted the chairman of the BTA and ETB, who has assured me of his full support and co-operation, and the review will take account of the boards' views.

There is every indication that tourism will continue to grow in importance to the economy and for the creation of jobs. This review will help the Government to continue creating the framework for that to happen.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Special Needs

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the monthly numbers and amounts of loans for special needs since April, together with the comparable figures for grants one year ago.

Mr. Portillo: The table shows numbers and financial amounts of payments from the discretionary part of the social fund for April, May and June. These data are provisional. Single payment data were collected in four-weekly periods and figures corresponding to calendar months could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Data for the two periods most closely approximately to the hon. Member's request are therefore given. For urgent needs single payments only the number of decisions is available, not the number of awards.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of claimants below pensionable age who have been dependent on supplementary benefit for five years or more, for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Portillo: The information is as follows:

Year	Thousands

There was no annual statistical inquiry in 1985: the one due in December that year was deferred until February 1986.

Unemployed Claimants

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of unemployed claimants and their dependants as a percentage of all claimants under pensionable age, for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Portillo: The table shows the number of unemployed supplementary benefit claimants and their dependants as a percentage of supplementary benefit claimants under pensionable age and their dependants.

Smoking-related Diseases

Dr. Owen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated percentage of hospital beds taken up by people with smoking-related diseases.

Mrs. Currie: The available information for diseases associated with smoking is given in the table. Not all illness from these diseases is attributable to smoking. In particular, smoking is only one of a number of causes of ischaemic heart disease.

Estimated average number and percentage of NHS acute and geriatric beds used daily by people with smoking-related diseases. England 1985

Child Health Services

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will instruct all district health authorities to report annually on arrangements for child health services.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities already report to the Department on developments in health services, including child health, in the annual round of planning statements.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement about the future role of nurses in the development of child health services;

(2) if he will make a statement about the future role of health visitors in the development of child health services;

(3) if he will make a statement about the future role of clinical medical officers and senior clinical medical officers in the development of child health services.

Mrs. Currie: The role of the profession involved in child health services is a matter for the professional bodies concerned and is a topic which is currently under discussion. They have set up a working party to review current practice in child health surveillance and to make recommendations for future practice. Their report is expected early next year.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about the future role of general practitioners in the development of child health services.

Mrs. Currie: The recent White Paper "Promoting Better Health" (Cm. 249) makes clear the Government's intention that general practitioners should increasingly be involved in health surveillance of children under the age of five. Subject to discussions with professional interests we envisage introducing an allowance payable to general practitioners who receive appropriate training and who provide child health surveillance services under arrangements to be agreed between family practitioner committees and district health authorities. It is recognised that the greater involvement of general practitioners in the services will take place gradually and that there will continue to be an important role for the community health services in child surveillance.

Benefits

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes he intends to make to social security benefits for people living in lodgings.

Mr. Portillo: The Government announced in April 1987 that help with housing costs for income support recipients living in ordinary board-and-lodging accommodation would be transferred to the housing benefit scheme in April 1989. This group will thus receive help on the same basis as the majority of households on income-related benefits.

We have today written to the local authority associations to consult them on the necessary changes to the housing benefit regulations.

We have also decided arrangements for providing transitional protection to people who would receive less benefit overall as a result of the change in benefit rules. People in supported lodgings receiving personal care from their landlords will be eligible for long-term transitional protection. For families in hotels who are not sponsored by local authorities, we will provide transitional protection for twelve months. Three months' transitional protection will be provided for people aged 25 or over and young people under 25 in vulnerable groups. Other young boarders will not receive transitional protection, but they will no longer be subject to the present limits on the period for which they can receive benefit as a boarder in any one area.

Transitional protection will be paid by the local offices of the Department of Health and Social Security and will be reduced by increases in the normal rate of income support in payment.

The local authority associations have been asked to comment on the draft regulations by 8 August. The final housing benefit regulations, along with the associated income support regulations, will be laid before Parliament shortly thereafter.

Disablement Services Authority

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has been spent on car phone installation for both officers and members of the Disablement Services Authority; and if he will give details of the running costs of car phones and of their usage and cost effectiveness in relation to other communication systems.

Mr. Scott: These are matters for the Disablement Services Authority to which the hon. Member should address questions.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the level of funding of research into myalgic encephalomyelitis; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: A number of representations about funding for research into myalgic encephalomyelitis have been received.

The main agency through which the Government support medical and related biological research is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid from the Department of Education and Science.

Griffiths Report (Representations)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has had from the chairman of the Social Security Advisory Committee in regard to the Griffiths report; what reply he has sent or will be sending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The chairman of the Social Security Advisory Committee has written to my right hon. Friend to give the views of his committee on the recommendations put forward in the Griffiths report. My right hon. Friend replied on 14 July that we will take the points raised into account in framing our own proposals.

Allowances (Tribunal Appeals)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest available figures for the average delay between the submission of documents concerning an appeal to the tribunal in respect of social security allowances and the appeal being heard.

Mr. Portillo: The latest available administrative statistics on social security appeal tribunals for Great Britain relate to appeals heard in the quarter ending 31 December 1987. For appeals heard in the three months to December 1987 the average time between submission of the appeal documents to the tribunal and the hearing was 16·1 weeks.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many transitional protection housing benefit payments have been made by the Glasgow unit;

(2) how many written and telephone inquiries have been received by the Glasgow housing benefit unit;

(3) how many of the applications for housing benefit transitional protection payment received by the Glasgow unit have been refused as being ineligible for a payment;

(4) how many applications for housing benefit transitional protection payments have been received by the Glasgow unit.

Mr. Portillo: As planned, the transitional payments unit became fully operational this month, making the first payments on Thursday 14 July. Up to 13 July the unit had received 19,628 written inquiries, 18,867 telephone inquiries and 77,750 applications for transitional payments. Already 14,892 inquiry forms, to obtain the information necessary to assess eligibility for payment, have been sent out to local authorities, and inquiries are now being sent out to local authorities at the rate of 4,500 per day. In the 190 cases where they have been returned assessments have been made. Ninety-six applicants were found to be ineligible for payment and in the other 94 cases applicants have been notified of their award and 18 payments were made on Thursday 14 July. These figures take no account of transitional payments being made to income support cases by the Glasgow unit.

Dental Treatment Claims

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the average time, and details of the range of times which it is taking the Department of Health and Social Security agency benefits unit in Newcastle upon Tyne to process claims from dental patients for payments for treatment.

Mr. Portillo: No separate details of clearance times are available in respect of dental claims. Information derived from a recent small sample of all claims for remission or refund of NHS charges suggests that about 43 per cent. of claims are cleared within 15 working days and about 84 per cent. within 20 working days. The average clearance time is a little under 15 working days, but this figure masks a wide variation in clearance times due to the need to seek further information in some cases.

Waste Paper (Recycling)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of waste paper in his Department is recycled; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Waste paper in the Department is disposed of by the most economic means available, including sale to paper merchants, but no records are kept of what proportion is recycled.

Disabled Persons (Survey)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of the precedent following the 1971 Amelia Harris report, he intends to advise local authorities to use the same format as the current survey by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys to conduct their own surveys of people with disabilities in their areas in compliance with their duties under section 1 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970.

Mr. Scott: Local authorities have a clear duty under section 1 of Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 to inform themselves of the number of disabled people in their areas and of their need for services. It is for individual authorities to determine how to fulfil this statutory duty. The reports of the recent series of OPCS surveys on disability are not yet published, and it is premature to speculate on the potential use of the OPCS's methodology at local level.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services on what dates he received the results of each of the four surveys on disablement conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

Mr. Scott: At the end of May the complete text of the first OPCS report on the prevalence of disability among adults was received by the Department. Subsequent reports have not yet been completed.

Departmental Employees (Statistics)

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many employees within his Department are currently employed in London and the south-east of England; what percentage of these are engaged in work which can only readily be done within this area; and what consideration he has given to the relocation of units within his Department to Manchester and other regional centres.

Mr. Moore: On 1 June there were approximately 99,000 staff in post in my Department, of whom 29,000 (including 22,000 in the regional social security organisation) were located in London and the south-east. I have accepted in principle that relocating some work would provide a better way for my Department to conduct its business by improving efficiency and by providing a better service to the public.

Detailed work is going forward urgently to identify those functions in both headquarters and some local offices which could be relocated. I shall consider all alternative locations which will enable my Department to improve efficiency.

Family Income Supplement

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many families employed in farming received family income supplement in April 1987.

Mr. Portillo: A total of 13,000 in farming and related occupations.

Income Support

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in each of the three categories mentioned in regulation 70(2) of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987 were receiving income support at the latest date for which information is available from the Derby London road and Becket street offices of his Department.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that this information is not available.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people entitled to supplementary benefit long-term rate did not claim at that rate at the latest date for which figures are available; how many of those were aged 60 to 79 years; how many of these are entitled to income support including the higher pensioner premium; how many are currently in receipt of income support with that premium; and what would the cost be of 100 per cent. take up.

Mr. Portillo: A note on the latest available take-up estimates for supplementary benefit (which are for 1983) has been put in the Library. The note repeats a reply previously given on 30 October 1986 at columns 231-34. Supplementary benefit take-up estimates for pensioners are particularly uncertain. The reasons for this are briefly outlined in the note described above and a more technical explanation entitled "Supplementary Benefit Take-Up, 1983: Technical Note" is also in the Library. Take-up estimates for income support are not yet available and will not be so for some years. On the assumptions set out in "Impact of the Reformed Structure of Income Related Benefits" some 150,000 pensioners aged 60 to 79 would receive the higher pensioner premium.

Invalidity Benefit

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many invalidity benefit claimants were in receipt of (a) each of the rates of the invalidity allowance and (b) the additional component, at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: At April 1987, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 220,000 people in receipt of the high rate of invalidity allowance, 154,000 in receipt of the middle rate, and 135,000 in receipt of the low rate. These figures exclude those whose additional pension (previously known as additional component) extinguished their entitlement to invalidity allowance. There were 692,000 people in receipt of additional pension.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the average amount of additional component payable to invalidity benefit claimants and (b) the maximum possible amount of additional component for invalidity benefit claimants, at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: At April 1987, the latest date for which figures are available, the average amount of additional pension payable to all invalidity benefit claimants was £4·30. The maximum possible amount at that time was £29·11. From April 1988 the maximum has risen to £34·75.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants were eligible for severe disablement allowance, but did not claim it because they were already in receipt of supplementary benefit and would not have been any better off financially if they claimed severe disablement allowance, at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: I regret that reliable estimates are not available.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) married women, (b) single women and (c) men are excluded from severe disablement allowance because of the 80 per cent. test of disablement.

Mr. Scott: Available information relates to claims disallowed because of failure of the 80 per cent. test and, as at 7 April 1987, is as follows:

(a) 10,111
(b) 2,202
(c) 3,629

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants (a) were transferred from non-contributory invalidity pension and housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension to severe disablement allowance in November 1984, (b) have been awarded severe disablement allowance since November 1984 and (c) are in receipt of severe disablement allowance at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

(a) 251,900 (i) non-contributory invalidity pension 197,100
(ii) housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension 54,800
(b) 45,000 (estimated as at 4 April 1987)
(c) 260,100 (i) men 102,200
(ii) women 157,900.

Benefit Claims (Persons Abroad)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many forms DLSB/A11, DLSB/A11A and DLIS/536, reporting claims for supplementary benefit or income support by persons from abroad, were received by the office of the chief adjudication officer in each of the last 12 months.

Mr. Portillo: The number of supplementary benefit and income support claims by people from abroad notified by local social security offices in each of the last 12 months is as follows:

Mentally Handicapped Persons

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what monitoring of the provision of services for mentally handicapped people is taking place in line with Her Majesty's Government's response to the second report of the Social Services Committee of Session 1984-85.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 30 March at columns 547-48.

Cervical Cancer Testing

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when a consultant pathologist will be appointed to lead the work of cervical cancer smear testing in North Staffordshire district health authority.

Mrs. Currie: I understand that a consultant pathologist has been appointed to run the cervical cancer screening programme in North Staffordshire health authority and that she took up the post on 1 June 1988.

Ms. Walley To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to improve the quality of cervical smears tests taken from women in North Staffordshire district health authority.

Mrs. Currie: Guidance on quality in taking and examining smears was issued to health authorities in January this year. I understand that the North Staffordshire health authority is undertaking a programme of action under the circular.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that women in North Staffordshire district health authority are receiving the results of their cervical smear test within the time limit set by the Government.

Mrs. Currie: The guidance issued to health authorities in January this year stated that laboratories must aim to send results to the doctors who submit a smear within one month of receiving it. I understand that the average length of time for submission of results to doctors in North Staffordshire district health authority is now four weeks, compared to eight weeks in March this year. There remains a small backlog of smears to be cleared, including those which are the subject of clinical discussion with Christie hospital.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Soley To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish a table showing the total number of households receiving (a) a rent allowance and (b) a rent rebate and the total cost of such payments and their average value in each of the years 1979 to 1987 (i) in Great Britain, (ii) in England, (iii) in Wales and (iv) in Scotland;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the total number of (a) home owners, (b) council tenants and (c) other tenants receiving a rate rebate and the total cost of such rebates and their average value in each of the years 1979 to 1987 (i) in Great Britain, (ii) in England, (iii) in Scotland and (iv) in Wales.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 27 June 1988]: The information available is given in the tables. Before 1982-83 assistance with housing costs was through the supplementary benefit scheme administered by the Department and the rebate and allowance scheme run by the Department of the Environment. Housing benefit was introduced for some supplementary benefit claimants from November 1982 with full implementation for all claimants following from April 1983. The data for the years prior to 1982-83 are based upon the rent rebate and allowance and rate rebate schemes only. The data for 1982-83 combine information from both the old and new schemes.

Departmental Offices

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what savings to public funds will accrue from the move of his Department to Richmond House.

Mr. Moore [holding answer 14 July 1988]: The move of my Ministers and 480 support staff to Richmond house is designed to improve operational efficiency rather than release financial savings. Hitherto my Department has had no premises within the Division bell area nothwithstanding the heavy parliamentary duties of DHSS Ministers.

DEFENCE

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Sainsbury: Details of the management and computer consultancy contracts extant in the Ministry of Defence as at 1 January 1987 are set out in the table. The contracts listed include all those consultancies handled centrally by the management services division.

Low-flying Aircraft

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what geographical area, expressed (a) by county and (b) by parliamentary constituency, is covered by low flying area 8.

Mr. Freeman: Low-flying area 8 covers

(a) the counties of Cheshire, Derbyshire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside, and parts of the counties of Lancashire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, Shropshire, Warwickshire, West Midlands, North Yorkshire, South Yorkshire, West Yorkshire and Staffordshire and (b) the parliamentary constituencies of Blackpool, South, Preston, South Ribble, Blackburn, Hyndburn, Burnley, Calder Valley, Halifax, Shipley, Bradford, West, Bradford, North, Bradford, South, Pudsey, Leeds, North-West, Leeds, West, Leeds, Central, Morley and Leeds, South, Batley and Spen, Huddersfield, Southport, Lancashire, West, Chorley, Rossendale and Darwen, Crosby, Wigan, Makerfield, Leigh, Bolton, West, Bury, North, Bolton, North-East, Bolton, South-East, Heywood and Middleton, Rochdale, Bury, South, Littleborough and Saddleworth, Colne Valley, Dewsbury, Bootle, Wirral, West, Wirral, South, Wallasey, Birkenhead, Liverpool, Riverside, Liverpool, Walton, Liverpool, West Derby, Liverpool, Broadgreen, Liverpool, Mossley Hill, Liverpool, Garston, Knowsley, North, Knowsley, South, St. Helens, North, St. Helens, South, Warrington, North, Warrington, South, Worsley, Eccles, Oldham, West, Oldham, Central and Royton, Manchester, Blackley, Manchester, Central, Manchester, Gorton, Manchester, Withington, Manchester, Wythenshawe, Stretford, Davyhulme, Altrincham and Sale, Ashton-under-Lyne, Stalybridge and Hyde, Denton and Reddish, Stockport, Salford, East, Hazel Grove, High Peak, Barnsley, West and Penistone, Sheffield, Hillsborough, Sheffield, Hallam, Rotherham, Sheffield, Brightside, Sheffield, Central, Sheffield, Heeley, Sheffield, Attercliffe, Wentworth, Rother Valley, Ellesmere Port and Neston, City of Chester, Eddisbury, Tatton, Crewe and Nantwich, Congleton, Macclesfield, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Stoke-on-Trent, North, Stoke-on-Trent, Central, Stoke-on-Trent, South, Staffordshire, Moorlands, Mid-Staffordshire, Burton, Derbyshire, West, Derbyshire, North-East, Derby, North, Derby, South, Derbyshire South, Bolsover, Mansfield, Amber Valley, Ashfield, Erewash, Broxstowe, Nottingham North, Nottingham, East, Nottingham, South, Leicestershire, North-West, Staffordshire, South-East, Meriden, Warwickshire, North, Cannock and Burntwood, Wolverhampton, North-East, Wolverhampton, South-West, Wolverhampton, South-East, Aldridge-Brownhills, Walsall, North, Walsall, South, Dudley, West, Dudley, East, Halesowen and Stourbridge, West Bromwich, West, West Bromwich, East, Warley, West, Warley, East, Sutton Coldfield, Birmingham, Perry Barr, Birmingham, Erdington, Birmingham, Ladywood, Birmingham, Small Heath, Birmingham, Hodge Hill, Birmingham, Edgbaston, Birmingham, Sparkbrook, Birmingham, Yardley, Birmingham, Northfield, Birmingham, Selly Oak, Birmingham, Hall Green, Solihull, Coventry, North-West, Coventry, North-East, Coventry, South-West, Coventry, South-East, Halton, Barnsley, East, Chesterfield and South Ribble and parts of the parliamentary constituencies of Blackpool, North, Fylde, Wyre, Lancaster, Ribble Valley, Pendle, Keighley, Skipton and Ripon, Leeds, North-East, Leeds, East, Normanton, Hemsworth, Wakefield, Barnsley, Central, Don Valley, Doncaster, North, Bassetlaw, Sherwood, Gedling, Rushcliffe, Loughborough, Bosworth, Nuneaton, Rugby and Kenilworth, Warwick and Leamington, Stratford-on-Avon, Bromsgrove, Staffordshire, South, Ludlow, The Wrekin, Shropshire, North, Stafford and Alyn and Deeside.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what geographical area, expressed (a) by county or region and (b) by parliamentary constituency, is covered by low flying area 14.

Mr. Freeman: Low-flying Area 14 covers (a) the regions of Grampian, Highland, Orkney, Shetland, Tayside and the Western Isles and parts of the counties of Central, Fife and Strathclyde and (b) the parliamentary constituencies of Orkney and Shetland, Western Isles, Caithness and Sutherland, Ross, Cromarty and Skye, Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, Moray, Aberdeen, North, Aberdeen, South, Tayside, North, Dundee, North, Dundee, East, Banff and Buchan, Gordon, Kincardine and Deeside, Argyll and Bute, Perth and Kinross, Angus East, Fife, Central, Fife, North-East and parts of the parliamentary constituencies of Cunninghame, North, Renfrew, West and Inverclyde, Greenock and Port Glasgow, Dumbarton, Stirling, Clackmannan, Dunfermline, West, Dunfermline, East and Kirkcaldy.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what geographical area, expressed (a) by county and (b) by parliamentary constituency, is covered by low flying area 19.

Mr. Freeman: Low-flying area 19 covers (a) the counties of Antrim, Armagh, Down, Fermanagh, Londonderry and Tyrone and (b) the parliamentary constituencies of Antrim, East, Antrim, North, Antrim, South, Belfast, East, Belfast, North, Belfast, South, Belfast, West, North Down, South Down, Fermanagh and South Tyrone, Foyle, Lagan Valley, Londonderry, East, Newry and Armagh, Strangford, Mid-Ulster and Upper Bann.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the minimum height for fixed-wing military aircraft operating in the Wash area of intense aerial activity.

Mr. Freeman: The minimum authorised height for flying in the Wash area of intense aerial activity overland is 250 ft; within the confines of the range danger area aircraft may descend to 100 ft, and in respect of Harrier aircraft only, 85 ft on their final approaches to target; senior commanders may authorise flying below 250 ft beyond 3 nautical miles of the coast for specialised operational training.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the minimum permitted height for fixed-wing military aircraft operating in the Cultybraggan danger area, D 602;

(2) what is the minimum permitted height for fixed-wing military aircraft operating over the landward portion of the Foulness danger area, D 128;

(3) what is the minimum permitted height for fixed-wing military aircraft operating over the landward portion of the Hythe danger area, D 141.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows:

(a) at the Cultybraggan danger area D 602, the minimum operating height when the area is activated is 4,000 ft. At other times a 250 ft minimum separation distance (MSD) is operated;

(b) with regard to the landward portion of the Foulness danger area, I assume that the hon. Member is referring to danger area 138—Shoeburyness—which incorporates Foulness island. When the danger area is activated the minimum permitted heights vary from 4,000 ft to 60,000 ft dependent on the type of trial. When inactive normal United Kingdom low flying restrictions apply;

(c) at the Hythe danger area D 141, when activated between 0800 and 2359 hours daily, the minimum permitted height is 2,000 ft; when inactive 250 ft MSD is followed;

(d) at Cultybraggan and Hythe aircraft may transmit with prior approval from the danger area co-ordinating authority.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the minimum height at which military aircraft are permitted to fly while conducting attacks in the Spadeadam range danger area;

(2) what is the minimum height at which military aircraft are permitted to fly while conducting attacks in the Otterburn range danger area;

(3) what is the minimum height and maximum speed at which military aircraft are permitted to fly in the run-up to simulated targets in the Spadeadam area of intense aerial activity.

Mr. Freeman: Further to my answer of 1 July 1988 to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) at column 399 of the Official Report, fixed wing aircraft are permitted to fly at 100 ft minimum separation distance (MSD) and at 550 knots during their final approach to target when within the centres of Spadeadam and Otterburn range danger areas. In addition, Harrier aircraft undertaking live firings may fly at 85 ft MSD within these areas. The overwhelming majority of approaches to these ranges are undertaken at heights of 250 ft MSD and above: however, on the few occasions when the border tactical training area is activated, aircraft in their approach to these ranges from that area may fly through the Spadeadam area of intense aerial activity at heights of 100 ft MSD.

Hang Gliding

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the co-operative trials with the British Hang Gliding Association in 1987 including the encouragement of hang glider pilots to use notified hang gliding sites.

Mr. Freeman: Following discussions between the British Hang Gliding Association (BHGA) the Ministry of Defence and the National Air Traffic Services, a voluntary trial was instigated whereby, during the period 1 March to 31 October 1987, members of the BHGA would seek to confine their weekday flying activity to 36 specified sites in the United Kingdom. It was agreed that military aircraft would bypass these sites by 1 nautical mile and would not overfly them at heights of less than 1,000 ft. The trial indicated that these arrangements might well enhance flight safety. Accordingly, the trial is continuing during the current year, with a few modifications, mainly to the boundaries of the specified sites. If this extension confirms the success of these arrangements, they might well be adopted on a permanent basis.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many air misses between hang gliders and military aircraft were reported in each year since 1979; and how many were in risk category A.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Category A	Others	Total
1979	0	2	2
1980	0	0	0
1981	0	1	1
1982	0	0	0
1983	0	1	1
1984	0	5	5
1985	1	1	2
1986	2	7	9
1987	1	3	4

Bird Strikes

Mr. Kirkwood To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the total number of bird strikes suffered by military aircraft in each year since 1979; and how many resulted in the aircraft crashing.

Mr. Freeman The information requested for each complete year since 1979 is as follows

Year	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Royal Air Force	464	621	693	785	768	779	743	710	685
Army	14	21	35	34	27	26	42	46	38
Royal Navy	18	25	24	37	27	43	26	36	16
Procurement Executive	14	21	26	20	20	28	22	12	19
Total	510	688	778	876	842	876	833	804	758

As a result of these bird strikes, there were 14 major accidents resulting in serious damage to, or destruction of, the aircraft involved.

AIDS

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any plans to carry out AIDS testing on Britain's service men and service women.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) on 20 May 1988, at columns 611-12.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of (a) the chemical warfare material transported across the United Kingdom for decontamination or destruction at Porton Down, (b) the transportation employed, (c) the routes used and (d) the safety precautions taken to safeguard the public.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Kingdom does not possess chemical weapons, but there are occasional discoveries of chemical warfare materials dating back as far as the two World Wars. In such cases the material is transported to the chemical defence establishment at Porton Down for disposal. While it is not our policy to give details, strict precautions are observed in the method and routing of such transport.

Trident Submarines

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what impact the current industrial dispute at VSEL, Barrow has had on the building of Trident submarines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: As a result of the industrial dispute at VSEL, some slight delays are now being experienced in the construction of HMS Vanguard and HMS Victorious.

Royal Arsenal, Woolwich

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he now expects to reach a decision about the future location of the Directorate General of Quality Assurance and the possible redevelopment of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich.

Mr. Sainsbury: The investment appraisal of a number of options relevant to current circumstances is nearly complete.

Persian Gulf (Air Defence)

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what elements of an air defence umbrella are available to ships of the Armilla patrol, and other allied navies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is not for me to comment on the capabilities of allied navies, but I can confirm that the ships of the Armilla patrol are equipped with an air defence capability relevant to the range of threats they face in carrying out their operational tasks. It would not be in the interests of the safety of our naval forces engaged in the Armilla patrol to reveal specific capabilities.

Helicopters

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the implications for the helicopter ordering programme of the latest developments at Westland.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 5 July at column 541.

Persian Gulf (Iranian Aircraft)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government will make available to (a) the Iranian inquiry and (b) the American inquiry into the shooting down by USS Vincennes of an Iranian airliner, the intercepts of radio traffic relating to that aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A recording of warnings heard on the civil distress frequency at the time of the incident has been passed to the United States Government. Although international distress frequencies are widely monitored and this information is likely to be available from many sources, any such request from other interested authorities would be carefully considered.

Royal Navy

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list the average age of the Royal Navy's escort force of destroyers and frigates as at 1 January (a) 1970, (b) 1974, (c) 1980, (d) 1984, and (e) 1988, and provide an analysis of the age of the vessels concerned at each of those dates: (i) under five years, (ii) five to 10 years, (iii) 10 to 15 years, (iv) 15 to 20 years, and (v) in each year of age over 20 years.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 5 July 1988]: The information requested is as follows:

Age[1]	1970	1974	1980	1984[2]	1988[3]
Average Age (years)	10·3	10·6	11·7	13·1	12·3

[1] As at 1 April for each year. Full information as at 1 January is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

[2] The figures for 1984 reflect the loss of HM ships Antelope, Ardent, Coventry and Sheffield in the Falklands conflict in 1982 and the necessary running on of older ships as a result.

[3] The average age of the destroyer/frigate force now stands at just over 12 years following the paying off HM ships Plymouth and Diomede and the acceptance of HMS Coventry.

SCOTLAND

Consultants

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the cost to the Scottish Development Agency of employing management or computer consultants for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) on 6 May 1987 at columns 445-46 which includes the information requested by the hon. Member.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract extant in his Department as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 31 March 1988 at column 646.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many research projects into myalgic encephalomyelitis his Department is currently funding; and how much is being provided in each case.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Home and Health Department is not at present funding direct research into myalgic encephalomyelitis but is funding at a total of £38,700 a surveillance project on viral infections which has relevance to this condition.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has received any representations about the level of funding of research into myalgic encephalomyelitis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This issue was raised in some representations about the private Member's Bill on myalgic encephalomyelitis proposed by the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood). A project on the serological surveillance of Coxsackie B virus infection, which is relevant to this condition, is currently being funded by the Scottish Home and Health Department. Argyll and Clyde health board has part-funded research relating to myalgic encephalomyelitis and on the advice of one of the Scottish Home and Health Department's committees the Scottish Hospital Endowments Research Trust has recently offered funding for a research project also relating to this condition.

Legal Aid

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report all cases and circumstances in which solicitors are entitled to make applications to the Scottish Legal Aid Board for a verbal grant of legal aid cover under the emergency legal aid scheme; and if he will make a statement on the possibility of extending those cases and circumstances.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Legal Aid Board will grant emergency legal aid in response to an oral application for civil legal aid in the following categories:

when there is imminent danger of assault to the pursuer and an interdict is sought;

when there is a serious risk of child-snatching or a child has been snatched very recently and proceedings must be brought for custody and/or delivery and/or interdict; where a defender has to oppose a motion for custody, interim aliment or orders under the Matrimonial Homes (Family Protection) (Scotland) Act 1981.

An announcement to this effect was made in the September 1987 edition of the "Journal of the Law Society of Scotland". A copy is available in the Library.

It is for the board to consider whether an extension to the special categories should be made. The Civil Legal Aid (Scotland) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1988, which were laid before the House on 11 July, will extend the categories of work which can be undertaken before an application is made to the board. This should help to reduce the present number of emergency applications being made.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will direct the Scottish Legal Aid Board to ensure that, where an application for an increase to the level of the authorised cover under an advice and assistance scheme certificate was initially refused but subsequently successfully reviewed, the effective date of increase should be from the date of initial refusal.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no power to give such a direction. There is no provision for review of refusal by the board of an application to exceed the financial limit for legal advice and assistance, which is currently £50 but is planned to be increased to £60 from 1 August. If additional information becomes available, any further authorisation granted is effective only from the date of approval.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to review the seven-day time deadline within which solicitors must submit to the Scottish Legal Aid Board completed applications for emergency legal aid cover under the full civil legal aid scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: The Scottish Legal Aid Board currently requires within seven days a written application for emergency legal aid where authority to proceed in urgent cases has been given by telephone. The Civil Legal Aid (Scotland) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1988, laid before the House on 11 July, extend the range of specified urgent steps a lawyer can take on behalf of the client without prior approval of the board. This change should significantly reduce the current number of emergency grants of legal aid.

The regulations have been developed in consultation with the Law Society of Scotland and the board following my right hon. and learned Friend's undertaking to take account of various representations.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what considerations underlie his policy for Scotland to have a uniform business rate with the rest of Great Britain.

Mr. Lang: The objectives of the reform of business rates are the protection of businesses from undue impositions by local authorities and a fairer basis of valuation.

Mr. Tony Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what Scottish legislation will be necessary to introduce a uniform business rate throughout Great Britain; and when such legislation will be introduced.

Mr. Lang: Legislation for such a purpose could not apply to Scotland alone. It is too soon to say what legislation applying throughout Great Britain would be needed.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what gains there will be for Scottish business and industry from a uniform business rate throughout Great Britain.

Mr. Lang: The effects of such a rate on Scottish business would depend on the level at which it was set, which cannot be estimated at present for the reasons I gave in my reply to the hon. Member on 19 May at column 515.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he plans to meet representatives of Scottish business and industry to discuss progress towards a uniform business rate in Great Britain.

Mr. Lang: There are no plans to do so at present.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Scottish Council (Development and Industry), Confederation of British Industry (Scotland) and chambers of commerce about a uniform business rate in England and Wales and Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Representations have been received from these bodies supporting a uniform business rate at Great Britain level.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what time limits for agreement have been imposed on the valuation experts of the Inland Revenue and representatives of the Scottish assessors in their discussions seeking harmonisation of valuation practice in Scotland and England and Wales prior to the introduction of a uniform business rate in the three nations.

Mr. Lang: I understand that these discussions are making significant progress and that it is hoped to reach agreements on some key areas in time for these to take effect at the 1990 revaluations. There is, however, no question of my right hon. and learned Friend seeking to impose particular time limits.

Woodland Grant Scheme

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is the practice of the Forestry Commission to seek the views of the local highways authority before either approving a woodland grant scheme or carrying out planting itself, in order to determine any costs in highways improvements required to permit subsequent extraction of timber; and whether approval to plant can be refused as a result of any such consultations.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Where, under agreed arrangements, a local authority is consulted by the Forestry Commission about a planting proposal, it may express its views on the adequacy of local roads to carry timber traffic. However, because of the time-lag of many years between planting and harvesting, the Commission does not accept that the existing state of local roads provides grounds for a valid objection to planting taking place.

Timber Extraction

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide extra financial support to local authorities to help with the costs of upgrading rural roads and bridges to allow the extraction of timber.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is for the local authorities to identify their needs in the production of their transport policies and programmes statements and to determine the priority to be given to forestry road schemes. I take full account of such work in determining capital allocations, but I have not been persuaded of the case for extra support.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) why, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Caerphilly of 13 May, Official Report, columns 217-18, the Forestry Commission is permitted to plant land which fails to meet the Treasury target rate of return; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will instruct the Forestry Commission to desist from commercial planting on poor quality land, and land subject to windthrow risk where rates of return below 3 per cent. are expected.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In his forestry policy statement of 10 December 1980 at columns 927-28, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) indicated that the Forestry Commission's new planting programme would, for social reasons, take place partly in the more remote and less fertile areas. It has always been accepted that such planting is likely to give a return below the target rate, and my right hon. and learned Friend sees no reason to introduce a change of policy.

Drumbuie Oil Platform Inquiry

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange for a copy of the 1974 Drumbuie oil platform inquiry report and the volumes of evidence pertaining thereto, to be placed in the Library.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am arranging for a copy of the report and decision letter to be placed in the Library.

Forestry Grants

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will instruct the Forestry Commission in future to list in its annual reports the number of grant and felling licence applications referred to each regional advisory committee of the Forestry Commission, and the number (a) withdrawn or resolved by amendment, (b) referred to the forestry commissioners and (c) approved by the commissioners for grant aid.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall ask the Forestry Commission to consider whether information on the lines requested by the hon. Member might reasonably be provided in its annual reports.

Glasgow Garden Festival

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals have been made for the disposal of the tourist attractions at the Glasgow garden festival.

Mr. Lang: This is a matter for the Scottish Development Agency and the festival company. Several attractions are leased or provided by sponsors and their after-use is the responsibility of their owners. The agency has a responsibility to minimise the net cost of the festival to the public purse and will take this into account in the consideration currently being given to arrangements for disposal of other festival assets.

Community Programme

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what information he has about the impact on voluntary organisations in the social work field of the ending of the Manpower Services Commission's community programme;

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact on social work services of changes in the Manpower Services Commission's community programme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am aware of the concern expressed by some voluntary organisations that they will not be able to continue schemes currently operating with funding from the Training Commission. Existing community programme sponsors have been advised of the opportunities available for participation in the new employment training programme. Decisions on participation are for organisations to reach individually, and I would not necessarily expect to be informed of the outcome in each case.

Rating Valuations

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information is available to his Department about the impact of different valuation practices in England and Wales, and Scotland on (a) the Scottish tourist industry, (b) retailing and (c) distribution and storage plants.

Mr. Lang: We have received a number of representations which suggest that where rate bills for certain subjects or classes of subject are higher in Scotland than they would be for comparable subjects or classes of subject in England and Wales the cause of the difference is the difference in valuation practice. But I have little evidence that distinguishes clearly between the effect of differences in valuation practice and other causes.

Health Boards

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions since 1979 he has removed the disability of a health board member to participate in matters being considered by his or her health board under the terms of the National Health Service (Health Boards: Membership, Procedure and Payment of Subscription) (Scotland) regulations 1975, section 12(2).

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None.

Ambulances

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is the intention of the Scottish ambulance service to privatise the non-emergency services; and whether tenders are currently being sought for the private provision of these facilities.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It is our intention to introduce competitive tendering for non-emergency patient transport. Consideration is currently being given to how this can be achieved but no tenders have yet been sought.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much of the money being allocated to tackle hospital waiting lists is going to the private sector.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The total allocations of funds to reduce waiting lists has not yet been made.

Farming (Employment)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) farmers and (b) farmworkers were employed in each county in Scotland in June.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: the altest available information is that which I provided in my replies to the hon. Member on 25 May 1988 at columns 190-91.

The June 1988 Scottish agricultural census returns are currently being processed and final results will be available in the autumn. I will write to the hon. Member then.

Education Reform

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will be in a position to make a statement on the unauthorised disclosure of communications between No. 10 Downing street and his office relating to opting-out in Scottish schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: As I have previously informed the hon. Member, on 16 May at column 350 in accordance with normal practice this is not a matter about which I am prepared to give any details.

Islands (Exchequer Subsidies)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much annual subsidy per head of population of the Scottish islands comes from the United Kingdom Exchequer.

Mr. Rifkind It is not clear what subsidy my hon. Friend has in mind. Figures for public expenditure per head of population of the Scottish islands are not available.

Wild Birds (Killing)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his reply of 11 July, Official Report, column 20, he will give a breakdown of the 546 wild birds known to have been killed in Scotland by the use of poisoned bait between 1 January 1979 and 30 June 1988.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers and species of wild birds known to have been killed in Scotland by the use of poisoned bait between 1 January 1979 and 30 June 1988 are as follows:

	Number
Golden eagles	25
White-tailed eagle	1
Buzzards	104
Peregrine falcons	3
Greenland falcon	1
Sparrowhawks	4
Kestrels	3
Hen harrier	1
Marsh harrier	1
Tawny owls	4
Herons	6
Corvids	272
Gulls	65
Pigeons	20
Song birds	31
Waterfowl	5

Scottish Special Housing Association

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will provide the full text of senior counsel's opinion on all of the questions raised by the Scottish Special Housing Association at the time it sought senior counsel's opinion on several points, including the transfer of houses to new landlords, in 1987;

(2) what was the date on which the Scottish Special Housing Association received the opinion of senior counsel on the subject of tenancy status in relation to the transfer of houses to new landlords;

(3) what was the date in 1987 on which the Scottish Special Housing Association sought the opinion of senior counsel on the subject of tenancy status in relation to the transfer of houses to new landlords;

(4) if he will provide the full text of all questions on which the Scottish Special Housing Association sought the opinion of senior counsel in 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Since these questions raise issues which are for the Scottish Special Housing Association to consider in the first instance and I understand that the Scottish Special Housing Association takes the view that the documents are covered by the privilege given to communications between a legal adviser and his client, it would not be appropriate for me to publish the test of either document.

However, on the basis of information provided by the Scottish Special Housing Association, I understand that the Scottish Special Housing Association submitted a memorial on 16 April 1987 for the opinion of senior counsel on certain management issues, including certain issues relating to tenancy status, arising from the recommendations of the policy review of the association carried out in 1986. Senior counsel replied on 29 April 1987.

Private Landlords

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of prosecutions instigated against private landlords (a) by category of offence and (b) for each sheriffdom for contravening (i) Housing Acts and regulations made under them, (ii) environmental health Acts and regulations made under them, (iii) building Acts and regulations made under them, and (iv) any other legislation relating to their landlord activities, for each year since 1980.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information which is available on the number of prosecutions in Scotland under housing, public health and building legislation is given in the table.

Private landlords cannot be distinguished from other offenders in the statistics collected by the Scottish Home and Health Department.
